CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

FIRST SESSION, FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS.

tract that cannot be enforced in despite of the will of the party who makes it. That is the very essence of a contract. The Constitution has guarded that great right by saying that the State shall not pass any law impairing the obligation of a contract. Now let this law be passed, and the result is that only such tax can be collected as is in accordance with State legislation, and such will be collected. The people of the country will see that there is power in the Federal courts to enforce their judgments, and consequently that the bonds of these cities will be paid and are good, and these bonds, which are now bearing 8 and 10 per cent., can be refunded at 5 or 6 per cent., at a great saving to the municipality. It is clearly for the benefit of the debtors as well as of the creditors.

I trust, Mr. President, that this act will receive the approbation of the Senate.

Mr. INGALLS. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey has certainly been remarkably frank and candid in his statement of the objects and purposes of this bill. If I did not misunderstand him, he admitted that it was to be enacted in the interest of the bondholders of this country and of the railroad corporations of this country, and to enforce whatever rights they may deem themselves to have in the several States against defaulting municipal and township corporations. Before we can properly discuss or consider the merits of this bill, its constitutional right, the authority of this body to enact it, so far as it can, into a law, I desire to ask him for information what corporations and what States are those against which he proposes to enforce the provisions of this bill? I understood him to say that there were certain States and that there were certain corporations which had issued bonds in favor of the construction of certain railroads; that when the coupons matured, the corporations had been in default; that when default had occurred, the bondholders of the corporations had proceeded to the Federal courts to enforce their rights; judgment being obtained and a mandamus being called for to compel the officers of those municipal corporations to levy a tax to pay the judgments thus obtained, the officers upon whom that duty was imposed had resigned.

This is not then a law general in its objects or purposes, but specific, and intended to be enforced against certain corporations in certain States in this country. Now, I desire to know from him, as he possesses that information, what are the corporations and what are the States that this bill is intended to affect?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is not necessary that I should answer that question, inasmuch as the hypothesis upon which it is based has no foundation. This bill proposes a law general in its provisions, and which applies to every part of the United States; it applies to everybody against whom a mandamus may issue. The necessity of the case, the evil which this law is intended especially to remedy, I stated to be that railroads had been built with money collected from poor people throughout the country, and where the debtors made default in payment they had resorted to this unjustifiable and uncommendable trickery to avoid the payment of the judgment.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from New Jersey cannot avoid the issue that has been pressed upon him in that way. He certainly did say that the necessity for the passage of this law arose from the fact that certain corporations in this country had defaulted in the payment of interest upon bonds issued for railroad corporations and for the construction of railroads in this country. That was his distinct averment; that was the allegation he made as to the necessity for the enactment of this bill into a law; and certainly the Senator from New Jersey is aware that for nearly one hundred years the processes of the Federal courts of this country have been enforced without resort to such extraordinary provisions as these. As he himself admits, the necessity for the enactment of this law is of recent origin; it is a new feature in judicial legislation; it is a new power that is sought to be conferred upon the Federal courts to give them authority to appoint officers in municipal corporations and in the different States of this country to enforce their decrees as against defaulting debtors. He certainly made the allegation that the necessity for the passage of this law arose from the fact that there were certain defaulting municipal corporations in this country against whom the decrees of the courts could not be enforced by the ordinary process that has been sufficient for nearly one hundred years of our national existence. He also named specifically the State of Iowa as one of the States of this Union which had rendered it necessary to resort to some peculiar method of legislation in order to enforce the decrees of courts. Now, sir, I desire to know from the Senator, before we are called upon to pass this bill, what are the States in this Union in which it is proposed to authorize the Federal courts to appoint officers to carry out their local laws?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The bill means just what it says, that it is intended by it that the Federal courts in all the States of the Union, wherever the proper officers fail to perform their duty, shall have the power of appointing officers to perform that duty. That is all the answer that I have to make. I am not going into a specification. As to the State of Iowa, so far from that being in default, the State of Iowa has done more to remedy the evil than any other State.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask the Senator a question in reference to one point. The bill provides:

> That whenever the circuit courts of the United States shall, in the exercise of their jurisdiction, issue writs of mandamus or other common-law writs, and the party or persons to whom said writs shall be directed shall, for any cause, neglect or fail to perform the act or duty required by the said writ or writs, the court from which said writ issues may, upon the application of the person for whose benefit the writ is issued, besides or instead of proceeding against the defendant by attachment, direct that the act required to be done shall be done by some person appointed by the court.

Now, suppose the board of supervisors or county commissioners, or whatever the name of the office may be that levies the tax in the different counties or cities for the benefit of a railroad or any other corporation that has had bonds given to it for certain specific purposes, shall fail to levy a tax for the purpose of paying the bonds or the interest thereon, is it intended by this bill that the United States court, if the supervisors shall disobey the writ and refuse to levy the tax, shall then appoint a board of supervisors to levy that tax? Is that the meaning of this bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Does the Senator want an answer?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir; to that question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend speaks about the act being for the benefit of railroads.

Mr. LOGAN. No, I do not. I only ask the question in reference to any corporation.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I only wish to say in reference to that subject, that I do not know of any railroad that has any interest in this law. I never heard of one.

Mr. SARGENT. I can give the Senator an instance if he wants it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I never heard of any railroad that had any interest in this act. I only wished to repel the intimation that this was an act introduced in favor of railroads. I suppose that very few railroads hold these bonds, but that they have been distributed throughout the country and are held largely. I know there are some held by poor people in my State. I saw a statement that in the State of Maine the savings-banks had a million of them.

Now in answer to my friend's question, I certainly understand that by this act where the State has directed that such a sum shall be levied for the payment of that interest, and the county officers, the assessor or collector or supervisor, omit to obey the mandate of the court, then the court has power to appoint other persons to perform that duty.

Mr. LOGAN. That was exactly what I thought the bill meant.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Exactly, and I so stated.

Mr. LOGAN. If it means that, it is in violation of every principle known to our institutions, and I will demonstrate it. Suppose any State in her State constitution provides that the taxes shall be levied in the different counties by a board of supervisors. There then is a constitutional provision pointing out the mode and manner in which taxes are levied. Then, following that, those taxes are collected by a tax-gatherer or tax-collector. If the constitution of the State points out the mode and manner of assessment for taxation, I ask what power Congress has to confer that authority upon a United States court? If the board of supervisors or county commissioners shall refuse, or fail, or neglect to levy that tax, how can we say that the court shall appoint a board of supervisors for that county to do it in violation of the constitution of that State? What authority have we to do that? Where does Congress get that power to invade the rights of a State in violation of its own constitution, in order that the Federal court shall have power to levy and assess taxes and then appoint tax-gatherers? I should like to know where that power is derived from. I should like to understand it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. My friend asks his questions in rather a peremptory manner if he is only seeking information. If he understands me to say that the Congress of the United States have a right to pass a law to authorize the Federal courts to tax the people of this county, he very much misunderstands me. I do not suppose that there is any constitution of a State in the Union that has any provision in favor of the officers of the State evading their duty. I do not suppose that the constitution of Illinois makes it one of the constitutional rights of that State that a contract shall be avoided by the resignation of a subordinate officer.

As to where we get this authority, it is very plain. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to establish inferior courts, and to pass all laws to carry that provision into effect. It says that the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in the Federal courts. This is rendering perfectly nugatory all power; it is rendering the mandate of the courts idle. They give judgment; but what is the judgment worth? The State has done its duty; it has provided by law for the collection of that money; it has appointed the officer to perform the duty, and the State, when it is a State judgment, as in Iowa, gives the State courts the power to do just this thing. And now, we being under obligation to protect the national courts as a national Legislature, are under the same obligation to do it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And no State has authority to confer this power on the Federal courts.

Mr. McDONALD. I desire to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he proposes to press this bill at this time? A suggestion was made by the Senator from Virginia that it lie over to enable his colleague to be here, who desired to be heard upon it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There are only about five minutes of the morning hour left. I suppose the bill will go over at one o'clock at any rate.

Mr. LOGAN. A word in answer to the Senator from New Jersey in reference to the power of Congress. So far as the power of Congress is concerned to authorize courts for certain purposes, there is no dispute; but when the Senator tells me that Congress has power to authorize a Federal court to levy a tax in a State for the benefit of an individual or corporation, I deny the power. It exists nowhere in the Constitution of the United States or in any authority given to Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I entirely agree with my friend that the United States has no authority to confer any power on the Federal courts to levy a tax; but where the State has levied a tax by its law, where it has appointed its officers to perform the duty, and where it is a mere individual dereliction of that officer in doing what the State tells him to do, then I insist that the judgment of the Federal court does not become nugatory and void at the will of that defaulting officer.

Mr. LOGAN. Yes; but the point that I put to the Senator was not where the State had levied the tax, but where the officers of the State had failed to levy the tax under the law; and this bill, if I can read, is intended to apply to that particular case. Suppose, for instance, authority is given to the officers of a county to levy a tax for a certain specified purpose, and they fail to do it, and then you get your writ of mandamus requiring them to perform their duty. If they fail to perform their duty, you have plenty of authority to proceed against them to make them do it. But you do not proceed against them for failing to perform a duty that they are required to perform under the law, but you appoint men to perform that duty which they are required to perform, without proceeding against them, and make them pay the expenses of the process. That is this bill.

In other words, the Congress of the United States proposes to give authority to the United States courts to appoint county commissioners and boards of supervisors to levy a tax for private purposes. That is this bill, and that is the scope and meaning of the bill. I say without fear of contradiction that, in my judgment, this is the first time such a proposition has ever been seen in Congress. How can such a power or authority be delegated by act of Congress to a United States court? Why, sir, establish that precedent that Congress may delegate the power to a United States court to levy and assess and collect taxes in a State for private purposes or for the benefit of corporations or private individuals, and you then have taken a step to destroy the rights of the people in municipalities within the borders of a State; you have usurped the power of the State Legislature, its power under the State constitution to provide its own officers for specific purposes; you have interposed between the constitution of the State and people of the State and their rights and lodged that power in a court. That is the meaning of this bill, and that is all it does mean.

I say for one that the power does not exist in Congress to perform that act by legislation. That power is given to the States. That power belongs to the States. It is in their constitutions. It is for them to prescribe the mode and manner by which their taxes shall be levied and collected, and by that mode alone you can collect taxes for the purpose I have mentioned, and by no other. Can Congress say that under the constitution of my State or yours it will provide solemnly that the taxes shall be levied in a certain way for all purposes; that certain officers shall be provided, either appointed or elected, for the collection of those taxes; that if they fail to perform their duty the writ of mandamus shall lie against them to make them perform their duty; and that, instead of leaving the parties to follow the remedy provided by law, Congress is to take it into its control and put it in the hands of the Federal courts to usurp a power granted by the constitution of the State to its citizens and to its people; take that authority out of their hands and place it in the hands of a court? Why, sir, the proposition, to my judgment, is monstrous so far as our institutions and the theory of our Government are concerned. It is in direct violation of the theory upon which the rights of the people rest under the constitution of their States and the Constitution of the country.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the unfinished business.

Mr. MERRIMON. I rose to debate the bill which was a moment ago before the Senate, but as I see the Senator from California is about to call up the regular order, I defer what I have to say to another occasion.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Sioux Indians, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. J. D. C. ATKINS of Tennessee, Mr. ROBERT HAMILTON of New Jersey, and Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine managers at the same on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2736) to remove the political disablities of N. H. Van Zandt, of Virginia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2827) for the relief of Stephen Hull.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 64) granting the rights and benefits of the Soldiers' Home to John News; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

RELIEF OF SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. WITHERS submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same.

R. E. WITHERS,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. J. OGLESBY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JNO. D. C. ATKINS,
ROBERT HAMILTON,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, the pending question being on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, in line 13, to insert after the word "Austria" the word "Italy;" so as to read:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, &c.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senate some time since adopted a rule for five minutes' debate, provided a majority should so vote, upon appropriation bills. I do not wish to ask that it be enforced now; but I will suggest to Senators that, while full and free debate ought to be had upon this bill, it might be well to come within the spirit of that rule without actually adopting it. I will not ask that it be adopted on this bill. I think the debate yesterday was not unreasonable. It illustrated both sides of the question. I do not wish to object to reasonable debate; but I presume the debate has pretty nearly terminated on general principles, and that it may not be necessary to ask that this rule be enforced. Therefore I will not do so, but simply ask that the bill be proceeded with as rapidly as possible consistent with the views of Senators. I hope we shall have a vote on the amendment which has been discussed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. In line 13, after the word "Austria," it is proposed to insert the word "Italy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 14, to strike out "ten" and insert "twelve," and, in line 15, to strike out "sixty" and insert "eighty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China, at $12,000 each, $84,000.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understand that amendment to be necessary in order to make the bill conform to what has already been agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. The footing is $84,000, and the $12,000 restores the service to what it is now instead of cutting it down to $10,000, as the House bill does, so that it is a vital amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 13; as follows:

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Eaton, Gordon, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—13.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, English, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Maxey, Mitchell, Oglesby, Paddock, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, and Wadleigh—22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 16 to 38, as follows:

For salary of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to Italy, $8,000.

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Belgium, Netherlands, Turkey, and Venezuela, at $6,500 each, $38,500.

For minister resident accredited to Denmark and Sweden and Norway, to reside at such place as the President may from time to time direct in either of the states named, $6,500.

For minister resident and consul-general at the Hawaiian Islands, $3,500.

For minister resident accredited to Chili and Bolivia, to reside at the place the President may select in either of the states named, $6,500.

For minister resident accredited to Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia, to reside at the place the President may select in either of the states named, $6,500.

For minister resident accredited to the Argentine Republic, Paraguay, and Uruguay, to reside at the place the President may select in either of the States named, $6,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 38 the following clauses:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Chili and Peru, at $10,000 each, $20,000.

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Ecuador, Colombia, Bolivia, Venezuela, Hawaiian Islands, and the Argentine Republic, at $7,500 each, $105,000,

Mr. SHERMAN. If I understand the Senator from California, who has charge of this bill, these amendments restore the salaries to the sums now fixed by law.

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHERMAN. They are to make the appropriations required by law. I only rise to-day to call the attention of the Senate to the practice of the Senate heretofore in regard to these bills. The Committee on Appropriations have done just exactly what the law requires them to do and what the rules of the Senate require them to do, and I shall vote with them. But there was some criticism yesterday, a very severe criticism, made by several Senators in regard to the nature of the changes made by the House of Representatives. Although the House of Representatives probably was not mentioned in violation of our rules, there was quite a good deal of criticism in regard to the state of this bill. The bill as sent to us by the House of Representatives, we are told, is an entire uprooting of the whole diplomatic and consular service. The bill came to us repealing or modifying almost every salary and every law on the statute-book relating to our consular and diplomatic service. That is objectionable, and all the criticism that was made on that subject was perfectly justifiable. But I wish it to be remembered by members of the Senate, so that it shall not be thrown out to us on the other side, that the Senate of the United States has done this thing over and over and over and over again, on almost every appropriation bill that has been sent to us for the last twenty years. I make the statement and wish it to be recorded as the declaration of one member of the Senate.

It is idle for us to complain against the House of Representatives sending us bills of this kind, when we have done the same thing over and over again; and we have refused to correct it when they have remonstrated against it. While I will stand by the Committee on Appropriations against doing what has been done so repeatedly, yet at the same time it is not right for us to pretend that we have acted upon a different rule, and take virtue to ourselves for simply standing by the law, when we have for twenty years constantly and repeatedly proposed these changes.

My honorable friend the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] made a remark yesterday that struck me with some surprise. He complained that this bill practically absorbed the whole power of legislation in the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. The point was well taken, very well taken; and yet how often have we seen in this Senate various amendments offered from the appropriate committees crowded on the appropriation bill and sent to the House?

Mr. HAMLIN. That makes a difference.

Mr. SHERMAN. No, sir. We have put such measures on the appropriation bills and sent them to the House of Representatives, where they had to be considered by the Committee on Appropriations of the House, and we have forced the Committee on Appropriations of the House, sometimes without reading, to consider amendments to the appropriation bills, which absorbed all the business of all the committees of the House of Representatives. In other words, though it was always wrong, we have done repeatedly what they have done now.

Mr. HAMLIN. Never.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Maine is wrong. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads at the last session of Congress—I mention it only because the honorable Senator is a member of it—reported an important amendment to an appropriation bill affecting the rates of postage. The whole Army has been re-organized on an appropriation bill; the whole Navy has been re-organized on an appropriation bill; the Treasury Department has been re-organized on an appropriation bill. I have myself offered amendments entirely extraneous to the appropriation bills, and therefore I take my share of the responsibility.

Mr. McDONALD. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if there was not an act ingrafted into an appropriation bill defining the qualifications of witnesses in the Federal courts?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no doubt of it, though I do not remember the circumstance; but I can say that the most faulty legislation we have had on our statute books for years has been caused by amendments put on appropriation bills of a legislative character; and when we do it here, although the amendment may come from the proper committee in the Senate, it is not sent nor can it be sent to the proper committee of the House. There is the difference. It goes to the Committee on Appropriations generally at a second stage of the debate, and usually without an opportunity of consideration by the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask the Senator when he proposes to begin the reform that I have been advocating so long and that is to change this course of practice?

Mr. SHERMAN. I propose to commence it now, and I hope from this time forward, as we now begin to find the chalice returned to our own lips, that we shall see the necessity of confining the Committee on Appropriations in both Houses, and all the other committees of the Senate and of the House as well, to an appropriation bill as simply a record of what the law requires for the public service, no more. And, sir, I am willing for one to adopt a joint rule which will prevent the committees of either House, or either House itself, from putting on an appropriation bill amendments that do not relate to the appropriations or that vary the existing law. As we complain now of this action of the House, which entirely uproots all the service and denies to the Senate the power even of considering these important questions, which declares "we will only appropriate so much and so much, and we will force the Senate to change existing laws upon the penalty of a failure of the appropriation bill," I hope that the Senate will stand firmly, not as a political party, but as a Senate, against this mode of legislation, and that hereafter we will insist that the Senate itself shall occupy the same ground.

Sir, I have resisted here, since I have been a member of the Senate, these amendments to appropriation bills; and I would not have said a word about it only that my honorable friend from Maine, who has been here longer than I, seemed to think this was a new thing, and that the House of Representatives, by tearing up all branches of the public service in an appropriation bill, were doing something so extraordinary that we ought at once to repel it. They have done it, and I will stand by the Committee on Appropriations in restoring this appropriation bill to the law in every case. Let them perform their duty of giving to us the proper means to carry into execution existing laws; but it cannot be denied as matter of history that the Senate has over and over again on almost every appropriation bill loaded it down with legislative provisions. We have sent them to the House of Representatives on the very last day of the session, when the House could not by any possibility consider them on account of the pressure of time, after the time of adjournment had been fixed upon, when all our amendments had to be sent to the Committee on Appropriations of the House without their having any previous notice of the character of the amendments, and so that they were compelled to consider them all in committees of conference.

As an illustration of this matter, I may mention that I reported to-day a bill to correct an enrollment of a law of last session by which as a House amendment to a Senate amendment on an appropriation bill the House put on a claim which I venture to say not one member of the Senate would vote for now. It was found that there was a question as to whether the committee of conference agreed to that amendment. The amendment itself was out of order and in violation of the rules of either House. When we came to examine the claim there was no foundation whatever for it, and it would have established a very dangerous principle. That was all the result of legislation by way of amendment to an appropriation bill without proper consideration by either House. It is claimed now that because that amendment had been agreed upon by a committee of conference both Houses of Congress are precluded from considering it. Provision for it was sent to us as a bill to amend an enrollment, when it was not considered by either House or read in either House.

Now, Mr. President, to these remarks I will only add that, in my judgment, the Committees on Rules of the two Houses, or some proper organ of the two Houses, ought to present for adoption a rule which will protect our appropriation bills from extraneous amendments. There may be cases of vital necessity where either House may assert its right to amend an appropriation bill and thus force the other House to consider the question, but it could only be a case of extreme and dire necessity, which might be justified by the extremity of the case, or where the proposition was so plain and simple that there could be no doubt about the concurrence of each House. But for either House to propose to change an existing law on an appropriation bill is practically to assert the power of defeating a legal appropriation and repealing a law without the consent of the other House.

I make these remarks, not so that the House may not feel called upon to say, "Well, you complain of us for doing what you have done," because I think we ought to acknowledge that what has been done by the Senate in the passage of appropriation bills heretofore has been wrong; that while we desire to check the House from following our example, we are not ignorant that we have ourselves violated the first principles of parliamentary law by our previous action in amending appropriation bills.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, perhaps in what I said yesterday I may have been misapprehended, or it is possible that I did not state as distinctly as I ought to have done the course of proceeding in relation to these appropriation bills, or state as fully as I ought to have done the reasons why I came to the conclusion which I stated. If we were to take the simple bill that is before us as an illustration of what the House of Representatives has done and of what the Senate may have heretofore done, I might be misunderstood. But I remembered that the bill making appropriations for the West Point Academy came to us reducing all the salaries. I took this bill up and found changes here supervising all the diplomatic and consular system of the country. I looked upon my table and I found still another bill, the legislative bill, which was printed in the House, covering precisely the same ground, seeking to reduce all the salaries and to change the laws in relation thereto. While I did not go to the House for the purpose of ascertaining what they were subsequently to do, because I should, under the rules which govern us here, have no right so to do; I did gather from other sources what I presumed would be true, that all the other bills that were to come here for the Army and the Navy and for the other branches of the public service were to follow out this precise system of legislation. It was upon the information thus before us in relation to three bills and upon the information which I gathered elsewhere through the public newspapers and in conference with individual members, that the same thing was to be carried out in all the appropriation bills, and it was upon that basis that I made the declaration I did yesterday; and I stand here to-day to take back not one letter of it, nor to change one comma.

I am amazed that a gentleman with an intellect so clear as that belonging to the Senator from Ohio cannot see the distinction between what has been done heretofore and this one uniform system that seeks to change the whole practice and the whole law of the Government in every one of its branches. The distinction is wider than a barn-door and it is deeper than a well; but yet he can see no difference between that and an amendment that may have gone to re-organize the Navy, if you please, in years gone by; but that amendment did receive the consideration of the Naval Committee of this body and it was thoroughly understood. Under this bill the changes proposed get no consideration from the appropriate committee either of the House or of the Senate.

But I agree with the Senator fully in the wrong practice of putting legislative matters of great moment on the appropriation bills. There may be some cases where the exigencies of the country may justify, nay may demand it, and the Senate almost unanimously would agree to it. I think I should vote for a rule to exclude everything that would not go in under the unanimous consent of the Senate, and leave it only to such cases as the Senate would agree to unanimously.

I repeat that when one committee thus seeks to usurp all the appropriate duties that belong to all the various committees, they do more than any committee has the capacity of doing, and that it is a system vicious in the extreme. It is one that compels us to vote for that which we believe to be wrong in order to obtain that which we believe to be right. The whole system is wrong, in my judgment, and I do think the Senator from Ohio fails to make that distinction which to my judgment is a very broad one.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let us see about it. Here is a bill from the House of Representatives. It has been sanctioned by the House of Representatives. We are not even permitted to know the history of that bill, or what reasons led to its passage, because the rules forbid our reference to the proceedings of the House of Representatives. We know, however, in a general way that this bill came from the Committee on Appropriations and changes the existing law radically, completely. Every line of the bill changes existing law. Does it make any difference to the Senate whether that bill was made up by the different committees of the House of Representatives or only by one committee? It is passed by the House; and to us the evil is just as great whether the bill that is before us was framed by the Committee on Appropriations or by the Committee on Foreign Affairs in the House, and it makes no difference.

The thing to be complained of is the proposition by either House to change in an appropriation bill the salaries and to overturn existing laws. What we have done in the Senate is this: The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have never undertaken to change radically the existing laws. They have to some extent, however. In 1870 there was an amendment proposed to the Army appropriation bill of seventeen or eighteen different sections, which entirely changed the organization of the Army, which changed the pay of every officer, and introduced the very system about post-traders that we may hear something about. That was one of the amendments ingrafted upon that general bill. That measure was never considered by the Military Committee of the House of Representatives, nor could it be, because it was passed at a very late period of the session, and it was sent pell-mell into the House of Representatives, and the House never had time to consider it. It was referred to the Committee on Appropriations there, and, after being read, was referred to a committee of conference, and then their report considered in the House. You may say that was an extreme case, but that was the practice of the Senate.

I say, therefore, and this is all I intended to say about it, that while we are criticising the conduct of the House of Representatives, (and I join in all that was said by the Senator from Maine as to the impropriety of this bill as an overturning and changing of existing laws,) we ought to acknowledge ourselves that we have followed in substance the same general practice by loading down an appropriation bill with extraneous amendments; carrying to the Appropriation Committee of the House the whole legislation of Congress; refusing to give to the House or its proper committees the opportunity to examine with care and detail into our amendments.

I do hope some committee charged with the subject may propose some rule which will restrain the Senate, or, if possible, a joint rule which will restrain both the Senate and the House, so that we may make these appropriation bills the mere transcript of existing law providing and designating specific amounts of money to carry out the public service during the following fiscal year. Then all forms of proper legislation can be considered by both Houses in the usual way, by reference to proper committees, and there never will then be an occasion for loading down the appropriation bills with such propositions.

The difficulty is that when any Senator or any committee desires specially to carry through a certain proposition which may be objectionable, which may invite competition or opposition in the other House, it is put on an appropriation bill, where there is no opportunity for examination, no chance for criticism even, and it is passed upon here probably with scanty numbers and at a time when the Senate is tired of the subject and tired with everything, sent to the House, not even considered there, sometimes not even read, but there referred in bulk to the Committee on Appropriations and reported back with a general formal disagreement to the amendments and a request for a committee of conference, so that the first action of a formal character between the two Houses is by three gentlemen representing either House and a final report, and we have here to take it in bulk or in whole by a single vote.

I make these remarks for the purpose of directing attention to this subject, and I do hope that a reform will be brought about by some one who will take the pains to correct the evil and if possible bring the two Houses to a concurrence on the subject.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think the evil of principle that has been discussed, so far as bringing the two Houses into collision or a state of excitement in respect of each other, will turn out in practice, as it always has, to be a very small one. I have never known an instance in the ten years that I have been here when either House has proposed anything new in an appropriation bill, whether it came over from the House of Representatives in the body of the bill, or was attached to the bill here by way of amendment, to which the other House seriously objected, where the proposing House did not recede from it. Each House has always acted upon the principle that in an appropriation bill, the evident object and scope of which is to provide money to carry out existing laws, nothing should go into it that the two Houses did not agree to; and when one House disagrees and insists upon its disagreement, the other House recedes; I mean in respect to what is called extraneous legislation, changing existing laws, whatever the changes might be.

That is a universal rule that has been in practice ever since I have been here, and it is evidently the only one upon which the two Houses can consistently do business and get on. If the Senate insists upon attaching to an appropriation bill the civil-rights bill, for instance, as it did, and it comes to a conference, then if the conferees of the House insist that they will not have it upon that bill, the Senate must recede; and it would have receded, as I happen to know. But the trouble in that case was that the majority of the House of Representatives was willing to have the civil-rights bill on the appropriation bill, and so both Houses were willing. So in this case the House of Representatives has followed a very common practice; not a good one, I agree, but still one that is common to both Houses, in undertaking to change the law in this bill. They had a perfect legal right to do it and a perfect moral right to do it, and they offer it to us. Now, then, on the same principle, if we are willing to change the law, both Houses will have concurred, and the law will have been changed on an appropriation bill in respect of these matters. If we are not willing to change the law, then the House, without an invasion of our privileges, cannot insist; and I have no reason to suppose it will insist or would desire to insist upon it, saying to the Senate, "You must change the law or we will appropriate no money to carry on the Government."

The only instance that I know of where the two Houses finally failed on an appropriation bill for such a cause was that which occurred in 1856, when this body had a decisive democratic majority and the House of Representatives had a very slender republican majority. I believe my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] was then what is called the leader of the House. The House of Representatives passed the Army appropriation bill, and they provided in it what would seem to me at this moment to have been a perfectly legitimate thing in an appropriation bill, that no part of the money appropriated by that bill should be used to carry on what was called the "border-ruffian" legislation about Kansas. I, of course, am not using the language of the proviso, but am taking the shortest way of describing it. The effect of that would be to prevent the President of the United States, in taking care that the laws should be faithfully executed, and as Commander-in-Chief of the Army, to make any use of the Army in supporting what he might believe it to be his duty to support in respect of one side of the Kansas controversy. The Senate, as a matter of course, disagreed to that proviso to the House bill, which was a mere limitation upon the uses to which the money should be applied. They sent it back to the House of Representatives. The House of Representatives disagreed to the amendment of the Senate in striking out that clause. There was a contest about it, and severel conferences took place, three I am informed; and finally, the House of Representatives persisting in having that clause in the bill and the Senate persisting in its amendment, the bill failed, and the Congress was adjourned without the passage of the bill. President Pierce called an extra session of Congress, and after ten days even on that point the House of Representatives, republican as it was, and it being a case of purely political effect, so to speak, where there would be excitement, notwithstanding, retraced its steps, receded from its insisting upon having this limitation upon the appropriation, and the bill passed without it. That must be the natural and necessary course so long as the two Houses maintain that respect for each other and that plain method of doing business which are essential to getting on at all, as I have no doubt they always will. But when you come to the detail of these matters we all understand that it is very unpleasant and very injudicious to undertake to rectify everything that is wrong in an appropriation bill. It cannot be properly discussed; you cannot get the requisite information; you cannot have it considered by the correct committee; but I do not see any ground myself for any special criticism upon the House of Representatives or anybody else in following the practice—in a little different form, to be sure, but still in principle the same—that has obtained, for good or for bad, so long. When the question arises, if the two Houses should finally disagree, which one ought to recede, that is a question which I have no doubt will be solved as I have stated when we reach it. The thing for us to do is to endeavor to make the bill right as we believe it to be, and trust the consequences to the future.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, there are several provisions of this bill that illustrate the inexpediency of the Committee on Appropriations attempting to regulate the public service, and perhaps none more so than the pending proposition. I find in the House bill a provision which we have just agreed to strike out:

For minister resident accredited to Denmark and Sweden and Norway, to reside at such place as the President may from time to time direct in either of the states named, $6,500.

Under the existing law I believe the minister to Denmark and also the minister to Sweden and Norway receive each $7,500. The House bill prepared, as has been assumed, by the Committee on Appropriation, unites those together and provides for but one minister, with a salary of $6,500. I think if the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate were to consider this question fully and carefully they would be disposed rather to increase the compensation and the grade of the minister to Sweden and Norway than to reduce it. I know an effort has been made heretofore in this body to do this, but it failed on one occasion on account of a rule of order.

I want to say with reference to Sweden and Norway, where we have a minister with a salary of $7,500, that if you look at the number of vessels belonging to those countries which cleared from our ports in 1875 you will find it larger than that of any of the nations with which we have diplomatic or commercial relations, except Great Britain. From Great Britain I find in the reports of our commercial relations there were 8,691 in 1875; from Norway and Sweden 1,013, and from Germany 780. Of the whole number of vessels cleared from our ports 12,013, one-twelfth were owned in Norway and Sweden. So that, considered in a commercial point of view, those countries stand second so far as their shipping is concerned. In fact it is the only continental country, with the exception of France and Germany, which runs a direct line of vessels to this country. Politically I think this mission is worthy of a great deal of consideration. We have in this country now probably 600,000 people who have emigrated from Sweden and Norway. We have in my own State something over 100,000, and they are a class of people who for industry and worth will compare favorably with native-born citizens, or with emigrants from any other part of the world. I think the Scandinavian emigration will outnumber the aggregate from all other nations with whom we have commercial relations, excepting Great Britain and Germany. Considered from any point of view, it seems to me that this provision of the House bill is not only a great mistake, but that it is an insult to those countries from which we derive so large and valuable a contribution to our own population.

Mr. SARGENT. Our direct trade per annum with them is over $8,000,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I am aware of that fact, and was about to state that our trade with Sweden and Norway is between seven and eight millions. The exports and imports of that country amount to something over $130,000,000 per annum. And yet the House bill, as it comes to us, proposes to send a minister, not only to that country, but to one entirely distinct from it, combining Denmark with Sweden and Norway, two nationalities as distinct as the United States and Great Britain, combining those two distinct and separate nationalities, and cutting down the compensation of the minister to both of them to $6,500.

It seems to me that no better illustration could be found than this present pending amendment of the inexpediency of a committee on appropriations attempting to regulate the entire diplomatic and commercial relations of the country on an appropriation bill. I think the compensation for Sweden and Norway should be increased over what it was last year, but I am satisfied that it cannot now be done, and therefore withhold the amendment which I would be glad to see adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the question which has just been before the Senate is far broader than that of mere economy in regard to the payment of salaries for a minister at any one particular post. It has touched the broad question of the proper method of legislation in the shape of appropriation bills; and I am glad that at last the necessity of limiting appropriation bills to their legitimate object is brought before the Senate for a calm (and I hope deliberate and in the interests of reform) consideration. Why, sir, during this session the Senator from California, who has charge of this bill, moved the adoption of a rule limiting debate on appropriation bills to five minutes for each amendment offered; and when I suggested that that rule, being both sensible and proper upon a mere money bill, should be accompanied by a further proviso that amendments should be germane to the subject-matter of the bill, and that incongruous matters of a general legislative character should not be added, the Senate by a very positive vote, and in my impression assisted by the votes of the Senator from California and the Senator from Ohio, voted down the amendment.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think I offered the proposition.

Mr. BAYARD. I remember very well that the Senator from California was present; but he knows more about his action than I do, and I may be in error, and therefore I withdraw the statement. It matters not; I merely gave it by way of illustration, and I may have been in error as to that; but the fact nevertheless is that when the Senate, who of course are controlled by a majority, had before them a proposition at the present session to prevent matters of general legislation from being ingrafted on appropriation bills, when an amendment was offered to confine the appropriation bills to matters germane to themselves, it was refused by a very positive vote of the Senate, and that more than once; and not only at the present session, but it was so especially in sessions in the past where they have refused to permit amendments to appropriation bills to be confined to matters affecting the subjects-matter of the bills.

Now, Mr. President, the condition of public business is this: Under the unbroken practice of the Senate for at least sixteen years the committees on appropriations of the two Houses have undertaken to amend existing legislation in the way of reducing, increasing, or creating salaries upon simple appropriation bills. The objection in this body, so far as my memory is concerned, has been confined solely to the small minority who have sat here. I can agree with the Senator from Ohio that an appropriation bill ought to be that which its name distinctly defines it to be: the appropriation of money for the purpose of carrying into effect existing laws. If those laws need amendment, let the committees to whom the consideration of the various subjects-matter of law are confided by the two bodies take up the laws and amend them. If by law, for instance, a salary is attached to a post, I hold it to be the duty of the Appropriation Committee to carry out that law, and that it is not a wise species of legislation that at the time of appropriation a mere money bill changes the law and changes the policy. I should be glad to see such a rule adopted. It would prevent our appropriation bills from becoming the mere drag-nets that they have become by what I must call the vicious practice of the two Houses of late years in covering all sorts of indefinite objects of a general character in a bill that on its face is simply to carry into effect existing laws by providing money as the proper machinery to run them. But, sir, is this rule to be adopted in an instant? Can you as practical men suddenly abandon practices of both Houses of Congress on this subject and in regard to a matter so important as this? Shall you here in the middle of a session, with less time to come yet during its continuance than has passed since we met, propose now to establish this broad and, if wholesome, at least sudden and precipitate change in the practice of legislation on this subject? See the result of it, Mr. President. The spirit of economy, I am glad to say, is abroad in this country, and, with it, of reform. It has not come too soon. If we would be an honest people, we must become an economical people. That much waste, much false economy, much extravagance have characterized the government of the country during the years of excitement through which we have gone is a fact that no reasonable man will deny. It is a fact of which there is to-day complete public apprehension, and there is a loud public demand for its reform. One species of reform, palpable and necessary, is the reduction of the official force of the Government. No man can doubt that there are by far too many officers under the Government of the United States now; that the clerical force of the Government is infinitely beyond all reasonable demands for the business of the country; that therefore a consolidation of offices is necessary and essential, such as is proposed in some of the amendments to this bill, letting one man do that work which he competently can do and which now is performed by five or six.

I mention this merely as an illustration of the character of economy that is called for and the character of economy that can be judiciously exercised. I will not at this moment give vent to my views on the subject of that other view of economy of the reduction of salaries below what constitutes a fair compensation for the duties to be performed, except to say that so far from being a true economy I deem it to be a false economy. It is denied by every act of a man's private life; and every man knows that those rules of administration which are true in private life will be true upon the more extended scale of public life, that if you reduce your compensation below what is just and fair you must look to see negligence and incompetence in public office instead of ability and competence.

But the question is whether now, in the face of the condition of public business, with the co-ordinate branch of Congress having acted up to this time upon the practice of both Houses of Congress up to this day, you suddenly will arrest their attempts at economy, whether you will arrest the legislation which has given them great labor to accomplish, and say that this new rule shall be sprung upon Congress and that the appropriation bills shall in no way intermeddle with existing law, but that the appropriations of last year must, dollar for dollar and cent by cent, be followed in regard to all appropriations of the present year, although economy, reform, necessity, all point out to you the need of change.

Mr. President, it will not do. We cannot and we have no right thus to arrest, complicate, throw into disorder, the machinery of the country's business by saying that upon appropriation bills there can be no change in the compensation of officers, no consolidation of useless posts, no abolition of sinecures, no remedy for those abuses which have grown and are always the consequence of a period of excitement; that we shall not take the customary methods, the practices of our Government, and apply them at the present session; because, if you do, you throw back upon the other House the result of all their labors in seeking in this and in this accustomed way the reduction of useless expenditures. Thus I say you will cause the labor of the session to go for naught; you may prolong it indefinitely; but I think you cannot be justified either in your own minds or in the opinion of the country for standing in the way of those just and necessary reforms which economy dictates.

I say, then, that as an abstract question I am disposed to coincide with the views of gentlemen on this floor who insist that appropriation bills should be confined to the provision of money for existing laws, and that if existing laws need amendment they should be amended in the regular and proper form by the introduction of bills for that purpose, and the commission of those bills to the various committees of the body deputed to consider and report upon them. I admit that that ought to be the rule, and I hope now it may be the rule; but it seems there has been a great light shed upon the mind of the Senate of the United States by the fact that the co-ordinate branch of Congress is no longer in unison as to political party and to political feeling with themselves, and yet that is only one of the benefits, and one of the small ones, that have come from having a check on the action of any one political party long in power. I only refer to it as a fact showing how a bad practice may creep in, how it may harden into acquiescence and almost law for want of a watchful and vigilant and strong opposition.

I am perfectly willing that a joint rule should be framed between the two Houses which shall simplify legislation, which shall prevent the ingrafting of incongruous measures upon appropriation bills, which shall prevent everything like general legislation from being in any way connected with the general appropriation bills, so that they shall be in fact what they are in name, simply provision of money to execute the laws of the land. Yet at the same time I do not believe that you will be justified, or that you can, without great public detriment, at this time, undertake to make that the law suddenly, and abrogate and disregard your former practice on that subject. I say this because I should have been exceedingly glad if there could have been notification given at the commencement of this session to the other House of Congress that they were to prepare their appropriation bills in the light and by the guidance of such a rule. But it was not done. The Senate cannot now adopt a rule hastily, off-hand, precipitately, such as was suggested by the Senator from Ohio without creating great public dissatisfaction. Time forbids it; the condition of the business of the country forbids it. Therefore I say that without regard to the wisdom or unwisdom of these proposed amendments, we still should consider that they are legitimate legislation. That it is legitimate, there can be no manner of doubt. It is simply a question as to method, more than principle. Any bill that is brought before Congress in any way and receives its assent becomes a law, and being a law it operates quite as well whether it came from one committee or another, for it matters very little through what channel of legislative machinery it reached a vote in each House and has received the signature of the Executive. Therefore these reforms, if reforms they be, these changes of existing law wrought by the appropriation bill, will be just as efficient as matters of legislation and are just as much justified by the Constitution of the United States as any other form by which we could place bills on the statute-book, and I trust that we shall not now vote against proper reforms, sound and true economies suggested by the appropriation bill, under the idea of the Senator from Ohio that we ought to recognize nothing in those bills save that which is in accordance with existing law.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, the Senator was in error, as he will frankly admit, in ascribing to me the authorship of the resolution to which his amendment was offered limiting the matter which should go into appropriation bills offered early in the session. It was offered by the chairman of appropriations. I refer to the matter not to set myself right on that proposition, but to explain why I disapproved his amendment, as I certainly did. I thought his amendment weakened the effect of the thirtieth standing rule of the Senate, and so stated in the debate. His amendment, as near as I remember it now, was that no amendment should be offered to a general appropriation bill which was not germane to the bill. That was about the substance of it.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

Mr. SARGENT. We already had a rule which provided that—

> No amendment proposing additional appropriations shall be received to any general appropriation bill, unless it be made to carry out the provisions of some existing law or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of some of the Departments.

No matter whether an amendment was germane or not, it could not be entertained under this rule. What is a germane amendment? An amendment to an Army appropriation bill would be germane which changed the salary of every officer or his standing in the service—any officer whose pay was covered by that bill. It might be a complete alteration of the service, and would not be in accordance with existing laws, but it would be germane; and I did not think amendments ought to be offered which were not in accordance with existing laws.

Take the Navy. You may change the modes of promotion, the modes of enlistment; you may change the mode of advertising for supplies, or anything in connection with the Navy, in conjunction with the bill which provides money to do those things, no matter how many laws there may be on the statute-book prescribing a different rule from that proposed.

Take the Treasury. To the appropriation for printing bonds you might put on a funding bill or regulate the manner in which the bonds of the United States should be handled; how they should be funded, whether at 3, 4, or 5 per cent. In fact there is no amendment you might propose which would not be germane to an appropriation bill, provided it had the slightest reference to the subject which was appropriated for. I thought that was too large a view; that that was an unsafe rule; and it being an amendment to a standing rule of the Senate, for it amounted to that, pro tanto it would repeal Rule 30, which said these things must have the guarantee of exist ing law and be proposed by a committee, &c. That was the reason we objected to it, and on those considerations it was voted down; not because we thought amendments not germane to the bill should be brought in, for we did not.

I have nothing to say at this time with reference to the general policy of reductions of salaries. I simply called attention—it is all that is necessary for the purposes of this bill—to the fact that the sums fixed in this bill as salaries of officers abroad were not fixed during the times of recent trouble or recent excitement. They were fixed twenty years ago. So far as they have been modified within the last twenty years, they have been reduced. I do not remember an exception to that rule. I know that some of them have been reduced, and it may be that one or more may have been increased, but I do not remember such a case. As a rule they have been reduced, they have not been increased; but, at any rate, they were fixed twenty years ago, long anterior to the accession to power of the republican party—if it is a party question—by a bill signed by a democratic President and fixed by a democratic Congress, at any rate by a democratic Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. The country did not owe two thousand millions then.

Mr. SARGENT. I admit the country did not owe two thousand millions; but it had scarcely more than half the population it has now. The number of our States has gone up, the business of the country has vastly developed, our resources are vast and ample. On the same rule we might abolish one-third of the House of Representatives, because a less number could do the business. On the same principle you might cut off expenses in every direction, cut deep into the Government in the exercise of its functions. You might say that there shall be no deficiency for carrying the mails, and cut off my region and the Senator's State from any participation in them, for I do not believe there are three post-offices in his State which pay their expense. I do not believe there are three mail-routes, at any rate, which run through places that pay the expense of the mail service.

We owe $2,000,000,000! Why should we pay out of the public Treasury for keeping up mail service in the Senator's State? His reply to me is, "In this the Government benefits the people; it carries letters; it facilitates business." In the same way and for the same purpose, I rejoin, we keep consuls abroad to facilitate business and accommodate the people, that the Government may be some benefit as well as a burden. I hazard the assertion, and can prove by the figures, that the percentage per head of expense for the mere civil administration of the Government at the present time is less than it was twenty or twenty-five years ago. The extraordinary expenses have been from the payment of pensions, from the payment of war claims, from the larger civil service necessary to straighten and arrange war accounts. These have been the items of extraordinary expense, and which burden us at the present time, including also the interest on the public debt; but the Government at the present time, so far as its expenses are concerned which grow out of matters having no connection with the war, is administered more economically now than it was twenty or twenty-five years ago, and I am prepared to show it. It costs the people of the United States now for all these purposes less per head than it did at that time.

But the American Congress has not been unmindful for years past of the necessity of reduction, or the interest of the people in that direction. During the past four years the reductions have been something like $30,000,000. In one session the reduction was $18,000,000. I am not disposed to defend any item because it is hoary, or to continue any item of expenditure that can be dispensed with; but I do not want to destroy the business of the country.

I showed yesterday in my remarks that the foreign commerce of the country during the past few years had gone up from $800,000,000 to $1,200,000,000 under our policy; that it was recovering. If you want to cripple it, to break it down, withdraw your consuls from ports where they now give protection to American citizens who go there, and give them information. Do so, and your ships will leave those ports. They will not go into a foreign country unless they can find some agent of the Government there to perform the necessary functions for them.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] called attention yesterday to the fact that our commerce was done in foreign bottoms instead of our own; that the disproportion had been growing for several years past. It is undoubtedly true; but it springs from one fact, that we do not follow the example which the civilized world, and notably Great Britain and France, set to us in those matters, as we formerly did. Commerce now is done by great steamship lines carried on by means of steam, and under the shelter of those great patronizing steamship lines sailing-vessels can exist. They create the commerce, and the sailing-vessels follow after them; and the nation which owns these great lines gets the commerce. By that means the commerce of South America has been kept in the hands of Great Britain by means of its steamship lines running to Brazil, and Chili, and Peru.

By that means they are taking the foreign commerce of our own people and our carrying trade from ourselves. Why? Because they make up any loss to those ships by subsidies and enable them to traverse the ocean, and the result comes back a thousand-fold to their people.

The policy of England with reference to its foreign service is exactly the opposite to that proposed by this bill as it comes from the House. They pay out some eight times the amount of fees which they receive from foreign consulates to pay those consuls, while we pay $148,000 less than we receive from them; and the result is that wherever an English ship-master goes he finds an agent of his government to receive him, to give him all facilities, to give him introductions, accommodations, information, protection, and by that means the trade of Great Britain grows up. There is a friendly feeling toward the nation that maintains intimate relations with the people of these scattered nationalities, their towns and seaports, by means of which commerce is carried on. Notwithstanding the vast advantages which America has for the trade and commerce of China and Japan, we hold on there almost by our eye-lids, because the English system of consuls and consular agents is so much better than ours, is so much better paid, is so much more pervading, that they can oust us from our natural advantages. It is a reactionary policy against the interests of the country. You save a few hundred thousand dollars by the bill, and you lose as many millions, ay, you lose by the $100,000,000, by cutting off your commerce, by paralyzing industry, by destroying your markets. Many of our manufactured articles, notably cotton and hardware, are making their way into the English colonies, and even into England itself. Our people have the industry, the intelligence, the capital, the skill, and are able to hold their own against the world, unless their Government is niggardly in the facilities which it gives to them to carry out that which they would do under fair encouragement.

While I am in favor of reform, and while I have stood in my place ever since I have been in the Senate—and Senators around me know it—and fought discretionary items, and have tried to prevent the passage of amendments to appropriation bills which would swell them beyond the amounts authorized by existing law, and wherever a fair case was shown have tried to see that there was a reduction, I nevertheless have opposed such wholesale crippling of the public service as this. I consider it my duty so to do in the interest of the Government and people.

If you break down your foreign service as is proposed here, you will get nobody to go abroad, unless it may be some rich snob, unless he may be some man whose mere ability is the wealth which he can take along with him, an accomplished diner-out at the Court of St. James or St. Cloud or Russia. You will have to employ residents of the countries for your consuls, having no American nationality or sympathy, and perhaps destroy your system in order to carry out such "economy," as it is called, as is embraced in the bill.

If it were true that these salaries had grown up as a rule during the last five or six years, or when greenbacks were low and gold was high, and they could be reduced reasonably, I would not object; but they were, as I say, established years ago, and they ought not now to be cut down, because they are now barely sufficient, and the interest of the people forbids it.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I gave notice yesterday that I would at an early hour to-day make a motion for an executive session. I hope the Senator from Delaware will give way now to enable me to make that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator yield for that purpose?

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose it is absolutely necessary; and I shall not object.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and twelve minutes spent in executive session, the doors were re-opened, and (at five o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 28, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

APPROVAL OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the Journal as read?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I am recorded in the Journal as not voting yesterday upon the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr PAYNE.] I was present in the House, and voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Journal will be corrected.

Mr. JACOBS. I introduced a bill yesterday. I see no notice taken of it in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. To what subject did the bill relate?

Mr. JACOBS. To the establishment of a post-route.

The SPEAKER. Then it was very properly left out of the regular proceedings, because such papers should be referred at the Clerk's desk. The gentleman will probably find a reference to it in the list of petitions, &c., at the end of the proceedings. The RECORD there says:

By Mr. JACOBS: The petition of the people of Cowlitz County, for the improvement of Cowlitz River, Washington Territory, to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JACOBS. That is not it; I introduced a bill for the establishment of a post-route.

The SPEAKER. Is this it?

Also, a paper relating to a post-route from Columbus to Yakama City, Washington Territory, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes, sir; that is it.

The Journal, as corrected, was approved.

ALIENS AS ENGINEERS AND PILOTS.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2928) to amend sections 4235, 4404, 4414, 4415, 4418, 4439, 4440, 4441, 4442, 4448, and 4470 of the Revised Statutes, and for the repeal of the act of April 17, 1874, entitled "An act to authorize the employment of certain aliens as engineers and pilots;" which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHEAP FREIGHT TRANSPORTATION.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Railways and Canals, as a substitute for House bill No. 1490, a bill (H. R. No. 2929) to provide for cheap transportation of freight between tide-water on or near the Atlantic Ocean and the Ohio and Mississippi Valleys; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

CHEBOYGAN, MICHIGAN, A PORT OF DELIVERY.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report a bill from the Committee on Commerce that it may be put on its passage now. It is the bill (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery.

The bill was read. It provides that Cheboygan, within the collection district of Michigan, be declared a port of delivery, instead of Duncan City, and that the office of deputy collector, now located at Duncan City, be removed to Cheboygan.

Mr. DUNNELL. This measure involves no increase of expense to the Government. Since the establishment of a port of delivery at Duncan City, Cheboygan, a mile farther up the river, has become the actual port where business is done.

Mr. COX. Does the bill come from a committee?

Mr. DUNNELL. It is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce; and the change is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COX. How much of a place is this?

Mr. DUNNELL. Formerly Duncan City was a mere lumbering point; but a mile up the river Cheboygan has grown up and is now the place of business. The bill is accompanied by a report.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman ask for the reading of the report?

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not unless some other gentleman wishes it.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DUNNELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

INDIAN AGENTS TO NORTH CAROLINA CHEROKEES.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to furnish the House of Representatives with the names of all agents or commissioners, general or special, appointed by the Department of the Interior to the North Carolina Cherokee Indians since January 1, 1875; under what law or rule of the Department they were appointed; the duties and services that they were required to perform; the amount paid them; and the funds from which they have been paid.

J. M. THOMPSON.

Mr. BEEBE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2930) for the relief of J. M. Thompson; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

SEALS, LOCKS, ETC., IN REVENUE SERVICE.

Mr. CAULFIELD, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be requested to furnish this House with copies of all contracts, and the character of any verbal contracts entered into by any person or persons for furnishing paper or glass seal locks, or other locks or seals, for their respective Departments or any branch thereof, since the 4th of March, 1869, to the present time, and to inform this House of what, if any, changes in the contracts for such locks or seals have been made in the character of the locks or seals in use, or those which have been in use, and the reasons for such changes; and to furnish all correspondence relating to contracts or to changes made in the contracts or in the character of the various locks or seals used by their respective Departments since that date for the protection of the revenues of the Government; and if any commissions have been instituted to examine into the character of locks and seals presented to their respective Departments for adoption, the reports made by such commissions, together with the names of the persons constituting such commissions; and further to inform this House what methods are now employed in the shape of locks or seals or other implements for the purpose of protesting bonded goods in transit and goods in bonded warehouses, and the character of such locks or seals or other implements used by the Treasury Department, or that of the Internal Revenue or any of its branches at the present time, and all expenditures in regard to the same.

AMENDMENT OF RULES FOR PAYING WITNESSES.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent of the House to submit the following change of the rules for a purpose which will, I think, commend itself to the approval of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Rule 138 be amended to read as follows:

The rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before this House, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $2; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to say the change made is this: As the rule now stands witnesses receive $4 a day from the House. It is proposed to fix the compensation at $2.

Mr. HOAR. Is this asked to be introduced for reference merely, or to be adopted at this time?

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that it be adopted now.

Mr. HOAR. O, no; let it be referred to the Committee on Rules for consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts think witnesses should receive $4 a day?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. They only pay $2 in the Federal courts and in the Senate.

Mr. HOAR. I think they should receive more.

Mr. HOLMAN. Very well; I ask that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Rules.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

BOOKS IN FOREIGN LANGUAGES FREE OF DUTY.

Mr. HOAR, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2931) to permit the importation free of duty of books printed in foreign languages; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL-BANK REDEMPTION AGENCY.

Mr. GOODIN. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to submit some resolutions of inquiry.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to inquire into the practical workings of the national-bank redemption agency of the Treasury Department and to ascertain whether any unjust discriminations in favor of particular banks have been made by the Secretary, and to report to this House the determination of the committee thereon.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Who introduces this resolution?

Mr. GOODIN. I do; it is simply a resolution of inquiry, and I hope the gentleman will not object to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department are now investigating this subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do, as I do not see any necessity for the introduction of such a resolution at this time.

LOTTERY TICKETS IN UNITED STATES MAILS.

Mr. GOODIN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of enacting appropriate legislation to prevent the use of the United States mails in the carrying of tickets, circulars, and advertisements pertaining to lotteries; and the said committee is directed to report to this House by bill or otherwise.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I object to that, as the subject has already been considered by the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and it is provided for in a bill now pending before the House.

MRS. FANNIE VAN NESS.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2932) to place on the pension-roll the name of Mrs. Fannie Van Ness; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. BANNING. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not insist upon his call for the regular order of business at this time, as we are informed that it is very important the House should take up and consider the post-route bill, which was returned from the Senate yesterday. It is considered by the Department that the bill should pass this morning.

Mr. BANNING. I will not insist on my demand for the regular order of business if it is the unanimous consent that the post-route bill shall not interfere with the morning hour.

Mr. COX. What is the regular order?

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports of a public nature, the call resting with the Committee on Military Affairs.

REAL-ESTATE POOL CONTUMACIOUS WITNESS.

The SPEAKER. It is the duty of the Chair to lay before the House for the action of the House two communications; the first of which is addressed to the Speaker by the district attorney of the United States for the District of Columbia, and the Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF UNITED STATES ATTORNEY, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, D. C., March 27, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the grand jury has this morning found and returned into court an indictment against Hallet Kilbourn which comprises five counts as follows, to wit:

The first count charges him with failing to produce certain papers before a special committee of the House, of which Hon. JOHN M. GLOVER is chairman.

The second count charges him with refusing to answer certain questions before the said committee.

The third count charges him with refusing to answer certain questions before the House of Representatives.

The fourth count charges him with the failure to produce the papers and the refusal to answer the questions before the committee.

And the fifth and last count charges him with the refusal to answer the questions and produce the books and papers before the House of Representatives.

I have isued a bench warrant for the arrest of Hallet Kilbourn under this indictment, and the marshal now has that warrant for service.

Yours respectfully,

H. H. WELLS,
United States Attorney, District of Columbia.

Hon. MICHAEL C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The other communication is from the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE SERGEANT-AT-ARMS, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 28, 1876.

SIR: I respectfully report to you, and through you to the House of Representatives, that on this day at ten and one-quarter o'clock a. m., Alexander Sharp, United States marshal for the District of Columbia, called upon me at my office and informed me that he held a warrant issued by the supreme court of said District, commanding him to arrest and bring before said court for trial upon a criminal charge one Hallet Kilbourn, now in my custody in the common jail of said District, by the order and judgment of the House of Representatives, because of a contempt of its authority.

Said marshal then and there further requested that he be admitted into the presence of said Kilbourn to the end that he might serve said warrant upon said Kilbourn, and take him forthwith by virtue thereof from said jail, and before said court for trial upon said criminal charge. With which request I refused to comply, inasmuch as a compliance by me with the request of said marshal would release said Kilbourn from my custody as an officer of the House of Representatives, and place him in the custody of said marshal and court aforesaid. I respectfully through you submit the matter to the House of Representatives for instructions as to what I shall do. A copy of said warrant is herewith attached.

JOHN G. THOMPSON,
Sergeant-at-Arms, House of Representatives.

Hon. M. C. KERR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the warrant.

The Clerk read as follows:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia, 27th day of March, 1876.

THE UNITED STATES } No. —, criminal docket. Indictment for refusing to testify vs. } before a committee of the House of Representatives.
HALLET KILBOURN. }

The President of the United States to the United States marshal for the District of Columbia, greeting:

You are hereby commanded to take the defendant, Hallet Kilbourn, if to be found in your district, and him have before the criminal court for said District of Columbia immediately to answer the United States touching the offense charged against him.

Hereof fail not, and have there then this writ so indorsed as to show how you have executed it.

Witness:

D. K. CARTTER,
Chief Justice, &c.

[SEAL.]

R. J. MEIGS,
Clerk,
By J. J. CAMP,
Assistant Clerk.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Hallet Kilbourn, a recusant witness, having by this House been adjudged guilty of a contempt of its authority by reason of his refusal to answer certain questions and refusing to produce in answer to a subpœna duces tecum certain documents, books, papers, &c., before a special investigating committee of this House; and said Kilbourn because of said contempt and the judgment of this House being now by its order and said judgment in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms in the common jail of the District of Columbia, there to remain in said custody until he shall communicate to this House through said committee that he is ready to appear before said committee and make answer to said questions and obey said subpœna duces tecum: Therefore, because of the facts and premises aforesaid, the said Sergeant-at-Arms is ordered to retain the custody aforesaid of said witness, and not to part with his custody or deliver him up to any other person, officer, court, or tribunal until the further order of this House.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to discuss the merits of this case. It is a very grave question, and one in the discussion of which I suppose the House will generally participate. I do not know what length of time the discussion ought to extend. I suppose it ought to be liberal, and what time the House in reason may demand for it I would be willing to grant. I now yield the floor to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. NEW.

Mr. NEW. Mr. Speaker, the matter of the recusancy of the witness Hallet Kilbourn has not altogether occupied much of the time of the House. So well settled is it that either House of Congress may commit for a breach of its privilege or contempt of its authority that thus far in these proceedings there has been no hesitation as to the power and duty of the House in this matter. I believe there will be as little hesitation now; but, in view of the gravity of the subject, some points which the witness attempts to make in his answer at the bar of the House, and the form in which the subject now presents itself, I deem it due to the committee, the House, and the country, that the authorities and precedents bearing upon the subject-matter involved in the resolution should constitute a part of the record in this case.

It will be observed from the reading of the resolution under which the committee was appointed and the preamble thereto that, on account of an alleged improvident deposit by the Secretary of the Navy with Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., of London, the Government has become a creditor of Jay Cooke & Co., the banking-house which failed in this city.

In other words, the indebtedness of Jay Cooke & Co. to the United States is because of an assignment by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. to the United States of claims against Jay Cooke & Co. in the sum of something over one million and a half of dollars, these claims having been proven in bankruptcy and thereafter assigned as collateral securities to the United States.

It is further alleged in the preamble as a fact that Jay Cooke & Co. had a large and valuable interest in a certain real-estate pool heretofore partially inquired into. Therefore, for the purpose of bringing to light that interest so that it may be subjected as assets to the payment of the claim of the Government this investigation was ordered.

That it was and is competent for Congress to thus find out on behalf of the General Government what it can upon this subject, with a view to other steps being taken by the Government, in court if you please, is just as manifest as it is that a citizen may hunt up and understand the facts of his case before bringing suit or to determine whether he will institute suit or not.

Before the committee and by the answer of the witness at the bar of the House great emphasis was given to the fact that there was no person or party who had under oath filed specific charges or allegations. The witness claims in effect that specific charges and allegations should be made as a foundation before requiring him to answer questions.

I have shown what facts are averred in the resolution of the House. Now whether the Government represented by the House is a party of sufficient dignity and responsibility, the House must judge. The witness would place himself in the attitude of a party. I submit that it is not for the witness, or a witness in any case, to demur to the pleadings. He has no standing in court for that purpose.

The resolution under which the committee was appointed was not adopted upon the petition of memorialists making definite charges or allegations against some particular person or persons as to the commission of some defined wrongful or unlawful acts.

We are not trying a civil case upon issues made. There are no parties plaintiff and defendant. We are not trying a criminal charge with Mr. Kilbourn as the defendant. We are trying to find out what we can, within the scope of the resolution, as to the subject-matter involved therein. If when we get through we can make more specific allegations, they will be found in our report. But, sir, even then we do not promise the witness or his counsel that our report will be sworn to.

It cannot be said that there must be some foundation laid or showing made as to the materiality of the papers, &c., called for. I know of no court, State or Federal, where any such rule of practice exists.

It is well settled that if any objection exists as to the form or substance of a subpœna duces tecum, such objection is presented and considered after the return of the subpœna.

In some of the States statutes exist in aid of the common-law rule relating to parties to suits, by which one party may obtain an order upon the other to produce upon the trial an instrument in writing or paper by filing affidavit and serving notice as to the character of the evidence sought, and its materiality.

This is resorted to when the party seeking the evidence is not willing to take his chances in proving by parol the contents of the instrument, if not produced, as he could do at common law, but prefers the production of the instrument itself, so that there may be no mistake about its contents.

However, no question was raised before the committee, nor by the answer of the witness at the bar of the House, as to the sufficiency of description of books and papers called for.

The act of 1857, as amended by the act of 1862 and as revised June 22, 1874, is as follows:

SEC. 101. The President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, or a chairman of a Committee of the Whole, or of any committee of either House of Congress, is empowered to administer oaths to witnesses in any case under their examination.

SEC. 102. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine of not more than $1,000 nor less than $100, and imprisonment in a common jail for not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

SEC. 103. No witness is privileged to refuse to testify to any fact or to produce any paper respecting which he shall be examined by either House of Congress or by any committee of either House upon the ground that his testimony to such fact or his production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous.

SEC. 104. Whenever a witness summoned as mentioned in section 102 fails to testify, and the facts are reported to either House, the President of the Senate or the Speaker of the House, as the case may be, shall certify the fact, under the seal of the Senate or House, to the district attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action.

SEC. 859. No testimony given by a witness before either House or before any committee of either House of Congress shall be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against him in any court, except in a prosecution for perjury committed in giving such testimony; but an official paper or record produced by him is not within the said privilege.

The act makes no difference or distinction whatever as to the production of papers by a witness and evidence by parol. Both are placed precisely upon the same footing. I will read again so far as may be necessary to illustrate this from section 102:

Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter under inquiry before either House or any committee of either House of Congress, willfully makes default, &c.

Indeed in courts of justice they are upon the same footing. Mr. Greenleaf, as a note to section 558 in first volume of his work on evidence, quotes Chief Justice Shaw, as follows:

There seems to be no difference, in principle, between compelling a witness to produce a document in his possession, under a subpœna duces tecum, in a case where the party calling the witness has a right to the use of such document and compelling him to give testimony, when the facts lie in his own knowledge.

The witness by the common parliamentary law and by the act of Congress is not permitted to say that his answer would expose him to a criminal prosecution, or would violate professional confidence. He is required to answer, and as a matter of high prerogative right, as also from considerations of public policy, the House is authorized to require an answer, the law providing, however, that the testimony of the witness shall not afterward be used against him.

The witness has said in his testimony before the committee that his answers would not criminate him. He does not claim to be an attorney, nor does he pretend that he has not in his possession or under his control the books and papers called for; on the contrary, it was conceded before the committee that he had. That these papers may reasonably be expected to afford information pertinent to the inquiry with which the committee is charged cannot be doubted. No question has ever been before raised in this House as to its right to compel the production of papers. In the Credit Mobilier investigation papers of all kinds, including letters of the most private character, were examined. The books of one of the banking houses of this city, covering a period of over one year, were freely overhauled by and before the committee.

The rights of the witness under the fourth article of the Constitution are not invaded by the common parliamentary law and the law of Congress, nor by any action taken thereunder by the committee or by the House. No unreasonable or any other kind of search or seizure of his papers is being attempted. He is asked to produce certain books and papers before the committee in answer to a subpœna duces tecum. As I have said, this cannot be treated as a search or seizure, either reasonable or unreasonable.

Can it be fairly claimed that to require the production of books and papers by subpœna duces tecum is a violation of his rights under the Constitution? If so, then it follows that a subpœna duces tecum should not issue in any case, that it is an unconstitutional process, and that that fact has never been discovered until now.

I have spoken thus at length about the subpœna duces tecum because of the talk of witness and his counsel about private papers and private business.

Mr. Speaker, the power of this House as to calling for and compelling the giving of testimony, whether oral or written, is much greater than that of the courts. The additional power is justified and predicated upon grounds of public policy, and, in the language of a most eminent writer upon parliamentary law, "is considered to be fundamentally essential to the efficiency of parliamentary inquiry."

I will now read from Cushing on Parliamentary Law, § 1001, as follows:

It has already been seen that a witness before either house of Parliament cannot excuse himself from answering any question that may be put to him (with a single exception presently to be noticed) on the ground that the answer would subject him to an action or expose him to a criminal proceeding, or be the means of divulging the secrets of his client, communicated to him in professional confidence, or be in breach of a judicial oath, as a grand juror, or of a voluntary oath as a freemason, or the like, some of which would be sufficient grounds of excuse in a court of justice. This difference between proceedings in Parliament and in the ordinary courts has been established upon grounds of public policy, and is considered to be fundamentally essential to the efficiency of parliamentary inquiry. But while the law of Parliament thus demands the disclosure of the evidence, it recognizes to the fullest extent the principle upon which the witness is excused from making such disclosure in the ordinary courts of justice, and protects him against the consequences which might otherwise result from his testimony, the rule of Parliament being that no evidence given in either House can be used against the witness in any other place without the permission of the House, which is never granted provided the witness testifies truly.

Again, on page 269, section 684, the same writer says:

It may be laid down therefore, first, that every legislative assembly in the United States possesses all the powers of jurisdiction in a general way which are recognized by the common parliamentary law.

Again, he says on page 272, close of section 695:

In the foregoing, and all the States mentioned in this paragraph, as well those where constitutions do not as in those where they do contain the general clause above mentioned, it may be considered that each of the legislative branches has jurisdiction, according to the common parliamentary law, of all offenses committed against it by persons not members.

That the House has the right to punish for a contempt of its authority cannot, I think, be seriously doubted. I think it clear that the power of the House to punish for a contempt of its authority is possessed by the House without regard to any statute and without any express provision in the Constitution, as necessarily incident to its power of legislation as conferred by section 1 of article 1 of the Constitution.

In Barclay's Digest, page 231, the following language is used:

The failure or refusal of a witness to appear, or refusal to testify, is a breach of the privileges of the House, and has been punished by commitment to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms, by expulsion from the floor as a reporter, and by commitment to the common jail of the District of Columbia.

Reference is made to journals 1, 12, pages 276, 277; 2, 33, pages 315, 318; 2, 34, pages 269, 277, 281, 384, 567; 1, 35, pages 371, 387 to 389, 535, to 539.

The power of the House thus stated is not given as dependent on any statute, and the references made show conclusively that Mr. Barclay believes that power to exist independently of any statute.

Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, page 133, in speaking of the members of each House, says:

Each House has also the power to punish members for disorderly behavior and other contempts of its authority, as well as to expel a member for any cause which seems to the body to render it unfit that he continue to occupy one of its seats. This power is generally enumerated in the Constitution among those which the two Houses may exercise, but it need not be specified in that instrument, since it would exist whether expressly conferred or not. It is a necessary and incidental power to enable the House to perform its high functions, and is necessary to the safety of the state.

Again, he says, on page 134:

Each House may also punish contempts of its authority by other persons without express authority from the Constitution therefor.

I now call the attention of the House to the case of Anderson vs. Dunn, reported in 6 Wheaton, 224. This opinion was rendered March 2, 1821, thirty-five years before the enactment of the law of 1857. The court says:

Notwithstanding the range which has been taken by the plaintiff's counsel in the discussion of this cause, the merits of it really lie in a very limited compass. The pleadings have narrowed them down to the simple inquiry whether the House of Representatives can take cognizance of contempts committed against themselves under any circumstances. The duress complained of was sustained under a warrant issued to compel the party's appearance, not for the actual infliction of punishment for an offense committed. Yet it cannot be denied that the power to institute a prosecution must be dependent upon the power to punish. If the House of Representatives possessed no authority to punish for contempt, the initiating process issued in the assertion of that authority must have been illegal; there was a want of jurisdiction to justify it.

It is certainly true that there is no power given by the Constitution to either House to punish for contempts, except when committed by their own members. Nor does the judicial or criminal power given to the United States in any part expressly extend to the infliction of punishment for contempt of either House or any one co-ordinate branch of the Government. Shall we therefore decide that no such power exists?

It is true that such a power, if it exists, must be derived from implication, and the genius and spirit of our institutions are hostile to the exercise of implied powers. Had the faculties of man been competent to the framing of a system of government which would have left nothing to implication it cannot be doubted that the effort would have been made by the framers of the Constitution. But what is the fact? There is not in the whole of that admirable instrument a grant of powers which does not draw after it others, not expressed, but vital to their exercise; not substantive and independent indeed, but auxiliary and subordinate.

The idea is Utopian that government can exist without leaving the exercise of discretion somewhere. Public security against the abuse of such discretion must rest on responsibility and stated appeals to public approbation. Where all power is derived from the people and public functionaries at short intervals deposit it at the feet of the people, to be resumed again only at their will, individual fears may be alarmed by the monsters of imagination, but individual liberty can be in little danger.

No one is so visionary as to dispute the assertion that the sole end and aim of all our institutions is the safety and happiness of the citizen. But the relation between the action and the end is not always so direct and palpable as to strike the eye of every observer. The science of government is the most abstruse of all sciences; if, indeed, that can be called a science which has but few fixed principles, and practically consists in little more than the exercise of a sound discretion, applied to the exigencies of the state as they arise. It is the science of experiment.

But if there is one maxim which necessarily rides over all others in the practical application of government, it is that the public functionaries must be left at liberty to exercise the powers which the people have intrusted to them. The interests and dignity of those who created them require the exertion of the powers indispensable to the attainment of the ends of their creation. Nor is a casual conflict with the rights of particular individuals any reason to be urged against the exercise of such powers. The wretch beneath the gallows may repine at the fate which awaits him, and yet it is no less certain that the laws under which he suffers were made for his security. The unreasonable murmurs of individuals against the restraints of society have a direct tendency to produce that worst of all despotisms which makes every individual the tyrant over his neighbor's rights.

That "the safety of the people is the supreme law" not only comports with, but is indispensable to, the exercise of those powers in their public functionaries without which that safety cannot be guarded. On this principle it is that courts of justice are universally acknowledged to be vested, by their very creation, with power to impose silence, respect, and decorum in their presence, and submission to their lawful mandates, and, as a corollary to this proposition, to preserve themselves and their officers from the approach and insults of pollution.

It is true that the courts of justice of the United States are vested, by express statute provision, with power to fine and imprison for contempts; but it does not follow, from this circumstance, that they would not have exercised that power without the aid of the statute, or not, in cases, if such should occur, to which such statute provision may not extend; on the contrary, it is a legislative assertion of this right, as incidental to a grant of judicial power, and can only be considered either as an instance of abundant caution, or a legislative declaration that the power of punishing for contempt shall not extend beyond its known and acknowledged limits of fine and imprisonment.

As an example of the exercise of this power on the part of the House before the enactment of any statute upon the subject, I wish to invite the attention of the House and the memory of some of the older members in service to the case of James W. Simonton, correspondent of the New York Times. He had refused to answer certain questions propounded by a special committee. The committee reported the fact to the House, and unanimously concurred in the opinion that Congress was clothed with ample power to order the party into custody, there to remain by the same authority or until the expiration of Congress. The committee at the same time recommended the passage of the act of 1857. But independent of that recommendation, and before it became a law, the House, under its implied constitutional power, adjudged Simonton to be in contempt, and ordered him into close custody until he should answer.

The next proposition I wish to affirm is that when the House has adjudged a witness or other person to be in contempt of its authority, that adjudication is a conviction, and the commitment in consequence is execution, and no court or other body can, if the House has jurisdiction, review the facts or discharge the witness, or lawfully do any act which shall prevent the execution of the judgment or sentence of the House.

I now read from 1 Kent's Commentaries, side page 236:

The decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Anderson is accompanied with a course of reasoning which would seem to be sufficient to place the authority of each House of Congress to punish contempts and breaches of privileges on the most solid foundation, independent of the absolute authority of the decision. The constitutional exercise of the same authority by each house of Parliament has been repeatedly vindicated in Westminster Hall. It is a power inherent in all legislative assemblies, and is essential to enable them to execute their great trust with freedom and safety, and it has been frequently exercised, not only in Congress, but in the respective branches of the State Legislatures, and may be considered as indisputably acknowledged and settled. (Story's Commentaries, volume 2, pages 305,317.)

I will now read from Hurd's very able and exhaustive work upon Habeas Corpus, page 412. This work has become a standard text-book upon the subject of habeas corpus throughout the United States:

The right of punishing for contempt by summary conviction is inherent in all courts of justice, and essential to their protection and existence. A commitment under such conviction is a commitment in execution, and the judgment of conviction is not subject to review in any other court unless specially authorized by statute. It cannot be attacked under the writ of habeas corpus except for such gross defects as render the proceeding void. Brass Crosby's case, 3 Wilson, 183; Kearney's case, 7 Wheaton, 38; Yates's case, 4 Johnson, 318; McLaughlin's case, 5 Watts & Sergeant, 275; Johnson vs. Commonwealth, 1 Bibb, 602; Ex parte Alexander, 2 American Law Register, 44; Ex parte Nugent, 7 Pennsylvania Law Journal, 107; State vs. White, T. U. P. Charlton, 123; Ex parte Hickey, 4 Smedes & Marshall, 749; State vs. Tipton, 1 Blackford, 166; Clark vs. The People, 1 Breese, 266; Bickley vs. Commonwealth, 1 J. J. Marshall, 577; Gist and others vs. Bowman and others, 2 Bay, 182; Matter of Smithurst, 2 Sandford, New York superior court, 724; Lockwood vs. The State, 1 Carter, 161; Ex parte Adams, 25 Mississippi, 883; The State vs. Woodfin, 5 Iredell, 199; Ex parte Williamson, 4 American Law Register, 27; Ex parte Nugent, 1 American Law Journal, N. S., 111.

Again he says:

It is a rule essential to the efficient administration of justice that where a court is vested with jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon which it assumes to act, and regularly obtains jurisdiction of the person, it becomes its right and duty to determine every question which may arise in the cause without interference from any other tribunal.

Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, on page 133, says:

Independently of parliamentary customs and usages, our legislative houses have the power to protect themselves by the expulsion and punishment of a member, and the courts cannot inquire into the justice of the decision, or even so much as examine the proceedings to see whether opportunity for defense was furnished or not.

Judge Story, as to the power of one court to discharge upon habeas corpus a person committed for contempt by another, says:

Adopting the words of Lord Chief Justice De Grey in Crosby's Case, 3 Wilson, 188, when the House of Commons adjudged anything to be a contempt or breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence is execution. And no court can discharge on bail a prisoner that is in execution by another court. * * * It can do nothing where a person is in execution by the judge of the court having competent jurisdiction. (See Kearney's Case, 7 Wheaton, page 38.)

Again, in the same case, he says:

So that it is most manifest from the whole reasoning of the court in this case (Crosby's) that a writ of habeas corpus was not deemed a proper remedy where a party was committed for a contempt by a court of competent jurisdiction; and that, if granted, the court could not inquire into the sufficiency of the cause of commitment. If, therefore, we were to grant the writ in this case, it would be applying it in a manner not justified by principle or usage; and we should be bound to remand the party, unless we were prepared to abandon the whole doctrine, so reasonable, just, and convenient, which has hitherto regulated this important subject.

The case of Kearney, in 7 Wheaton, just referred to, was upon a petition to the Supreme Court of the United States upon habeas corpus, addressed to the marshal of this District, commanding him to produce before the Supreme Court said Kearney, who had been committed for contempt by the District circuit court for refusing to answer a question in a criminal case.

The Crosby case was an English case, decided in 1771 by the court of common pleas. Mr. Justice Gould in that case (3 Wilson, page 203) said:

I entirely concur in opinion with my lord chief justice that this court hath no cognizance of contempts or breach of privilege of the House of Commons. They are the only judges of their own privileges.

Again, on page 204, he says:

The resolution of the House of Commons is an adjudication, and every court must judge of its own contempts.

In the same case Mr. Justice Blackstone said:

I concur in the opinion that we cannot discharge the lord mayor. The present case is of great importance because the liberty of the subject is materially concerned. The House of Commons is a supreme court, and they are judges of their own privileges and contempts, more especially with reference to their own members. Here is a member committed in execution by the judgment of his own House. All courts, by which I mean to include the two houses of Parliament and the courts of Westminster Hall, are uncontrolled in matters of contempt. The sole adjudication of contempts, and the punishment thereof in any manner, belongs exclusively and without interference to each respective court. Infinite confusion and disorder would follow if courts could by writ of habeas corpus examine and determine the contempts of others. The power to commit results from the first principles of justice; for, if they have power to decide, they ought to have power to punish. No other court shall scan the judgment of a superior court or the principal seat of justice. As I said before, it would occasion the utmost confusion if every court of this hall should have power to examine the commitments of the other courts of this hall for contempts; so that the judgment and commitment of each respective court, as to contempts, must be final and without control.

In Alexander Murray's case, decided in B. R., A. D. 1751, 1 Wilson, 299, upon habeas corpus, Wright, J., said:

The House of Commons is undoubtedly a high court, and it is agreed on all hands that they have power to judge of their own privileges; it need not appear to us what this contempt was, for if it did appear we could not judge thereof.

Dennison, J., added:

This court has no jurisdiction in the present case. We granted the habeas corpus, not knowing what the commitment was; but now it appears to be for a contempt of this privilege of the House of Commons. What these privileges are we do not know; nor need they tell us what the contempt was, because we cannot judge it.

Some of these authorities and a great many others are cited in the case of John Nugent ex parte, decided in the circuit court of this district in May, 1848. Let it be remembered that this case was before the enactment of the statute of 1857. It arose upon habeas corpus, John Nugent being in the custody of Robert Beal, Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate of the United States. It appears from the return made to the writ by the Sergeant-at-Arms and other facts recited in the case that the Senate had been considering in secret executive session a treaty between the United States and the republic of Mexico. Nugent obtained in some way a copy of the treaty and certain amendments made to the same and proceedings of the Senate thereon, and furnished the same in his own handwriting to the editor of the New York Herald. He refused to tell from whom he received the treaty and amendments, and was therefor adjudged guilty of contempt and committed until he should answer. The District circuit court said:

These cases and authorities, we think, show conclusively that the Senate of the United States has power to punish for contempt of its authority in cases of which it has jurisdiction; that every court, including the Senate and House of Representatives, is the sole judge of its own contempts; and that in case of the commitment for contempt in such a case no other court can have the right to inquire directly into the correctness or propriety of the commitment or to discharge the prisoner on habeas corpus; and that the warrant of commitment need not set forth the particular facts which constitute the alleged contempt.

The court concludes in the following words:

After an anxious and careful consideration of the whole case, the court is unanimously of the opinion that the Senate of the United States has power, when acting in a case within its jurisdiction, to punish all contempt of its authority; and that, the prisoner having been committed by the Senate for such a contempt and being still held and detained for that cause by their officer, this court has, upon the habeas corpus, no jurisdiction to inquire further into the cause of commitment, and must remand the prisoner.

Now what propositions are established by these authorities and precedents?

First. That the House has power—the same as a court—independent of any statute, to punish for contempt of its authority in all cases of which it has jurisdiction.

Second. That the House is the sole judge whether the facts in a given case constitute a contempt of its authority.

Third. That, if by order of the House there is a committal for an adjudged contempt of its authority, the commitment is in execution of the judgment and order of the House.

Fourth. That no court has the power to review the action of the House in such cases, and cannot interrupt, suspend, or make a break in the execution of the judgment of the House upon habeas corpus or otherwise.

Cushing, in section 1011, says:

When a witness refuses to answer the questions he is directed to answer or produce a paper or other document, the proceeding against him is intended not only as a punishment for his contempt, but also to compel him to obey the order.

Will not the House be permitted to complete the execution of its judgment or sentence without such interference as would withdraw the witness from the punishment imposed?

Does not the power to adjudge guilty of contempt of necessity imply the power of punishment?

It will not be denied that in a case of concurrent jurisdiction the court first exercising jurisdiction rightfully acquires the control to the exclusion of the other. Where—after indictment and before trial—a justice of the peace took jurisdiction of the same offense, before whom the offender was tried and sentenced, the court held that the conviction and sentence were no bar to the indictment. (See 1 Wharton, § 541; 4 Texas, 242; 9 Texas, 43.)

Will not the same rule apply in this case? The jurisdiction cannot be said to be concurrent, for the offenses are different; but the House, having exclusive jurisdiction as to the contempt of its authority, must it not be the law of the case that its judgment shall be executed before another tribunal takes the control of the person of the witness? And is this not especially true as between this House and an inferior court?

If upon a warrant issued upon indictment found by the grand jury of this District the witness should be arrested, he could not be taken before the court for trial without passing out of the custody into which he has been committed. If taken before the said court, tried, and convicted, he must of necessity, if the judgment of the court be executed, pass out of the custody fixed and designated by the House, for the reason that, if tried and convicted upon the indictment, the penalty must be imprisonment as well as a fine.

Before closing my remarks I wish to notice a theory presented by the witness in his answer made before the bar of the House. He claims that the statute of 1857, as amended by the act of 1862 and as revised in 1874, was intended to and did divest the House of all power as to a recusant witness, except to have the fact certified, as provided by the statute, to the district attorney, to be by him brought to the notice of the grand jury for their action. He says that the House, by omitting in the revision the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing," disarmed itself of a power which he admits it possessed before. And therefore it follows, he says, that a commitment for contempt would be a violation of the Constitution, inasmuch as if he should afterward be punished for misdemeanor under the statute, he would altogether be punished twice for the same offense. Let us examine these points or propositions for a moment and see if they will bear the test of reason and the well-settled rules of construction.

At this point, before proceeding further, I wish to remark that it cannot be punishment twice for the same offense. One offense is a contempt of the authority of the House. The other offense is a public offense. Both proceed from the same act, but are different offenses. That this may be is too well settled to be doubted. I will read from Wharton's American Criminal Law on this point, volume 1, § 542. He says:

A person may be indicted for an assault committed in view of the court though previously fined for the contempt. The plea of autrefois acquit shall not avail him, because the same act constitutes two offenses; one violates the law which protects courts of justice, and stamps an efficient character on their proceedings; the other is leveled against the general law, which maintains the public order and tranquillity. So when General Houston had been punished by the House of Representatives for a contempt and breach of privilege, it was held that this action of the House was no bar to an indictment for an assault and battery growing out of the same transaction.

The ruling in Houston's case was made by the circuit court in this District.

I have shown that the House possessed the power, before the enactment of the statute of 1857, to punish for a contempt of its authority. The Supreme Court, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn, 6 Wheaton, and other authorities which I have cited, declare that it is a power derived from constitutional implication, following as a necessary incident an express grant.

The act of 1857 in the first instance, and as amended and revised, never purported, either by its title or text, to confer upon Congress the power to punish for a contempt, but manifestly from its language proceeded upon the theory and fact that such power already existed.

Now, can it be believed that this dropping out in the revision of the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing" stripped the House of the power which it possessed under the Constitution? Will it be believed that such was the intention of Congress? If a divestment of power so important and so long exercised had been intended, would not a purpose and change so radical have provoked comment and debate at the time? Would not such purpose have been declared by words used, not by words omitted?

The power of Congress as to the punishment of contempt of its authority could not be affected by or in any manner dependent upon the words "in addition to the pains and penalties now existing," for the reason that those words do not declare or describe the character of the "pains and penalties." The insertion of those words in the act of 1857 added nothing to that statute; for if those pains and penalties already existed, no new or other life or force was given the same by a mere reference to their existence in the act of 1857. It follows, therefore, that the omission of those words from the revision took nothing of substance from the act of 1857, for the reason, as already stated, that the insertion of the same had added nothing to that act.

The revision was adopted June 22, 1874. On the 15th of the next January Richard B. Irwin was committed by this House because of his refusal to answer certain questions. The Speaker at the same time certified, as required by law, the fact of this refusal to answer the questions to the district prosecuting attorney. Would this action of the House have been had without one word of comment or protest by the very members who ratified the revision, if it was intended in that revision to give "exclusive power to the court," as claimed by the witness? This is too absurd to be entitled to further notice.

The answer of the witness further says:

No one will say that the two Houses of Congress had not the right to disarm themselves of a power which they thought might be better placed in the hands of the judicial authorities.

For one I am very much inclined to doubt this. If the right to punish for a contempt is by implication conferred by the Constitution upon the House as a power necessary in aid of an express grant, I do not believe that Congress can by words omitted or expressed divest itself of such organic element or function; certainly not so that it cannot resume its exercise again at pleasure.

The words "in addition to existing pains and penalties," in the statutes of 1857 and 1862, were surplusage and were very properly omitted in the revision.

There are no words in the statute as revised which negative the common parliamentary law which Congress had always exercised as to punishing for contempts.

Sedgwick on Statutes, page 97, says:

A general statute without negative words will not repeal the particular provisions of the former one unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent.

And this is true as to the effect of a statute upon the existing common-law remedy. The old one remains, unless the act necessarily abolishes it. (See Sedgwick on Statutes, 342.)

Now, it seems to me that a much more plausible argument against the power of the House to punish a witness for contempt than any which I have yet heard would be found in the fact that the Constitution, by express provision, gives to each House the power to punish or expel its members; thus, by the application of a familiar maxim, raising an implication against the power to punish any other than their own members. But the Supreme Court, in the case of Anderson vs. Dunn, say:

This argument proves too much; for its direct application would lead to the annihilation of almost every power of Congress. To enforce its laws upon any subject without the sanction of punishment is obviously impossible. Nor did the idea ever occur to any one that the express grant in one class of cases repelled the assumption of the punishing power in any other.

The court say further, in this connection:

The truth is that this exercise of the powers given over their own members was of such a delicate nature that a constitutional provision became necessary to assert or communicate it. Constituted as that body is of the delegates of confederated States, some such provision was necessary to guard against their mutual jealousy, since every proceeding against a representative would indirectly affect the honor or interests of the State which sent him.

It is a very grave question whether, if the witness be taken before the District court for trial, he does not then and there by operation of law cease to be in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms for any purpose or in any degree. Now, if there is any doubt about this, shall not the House maintain an exclusive custody and jurisdiction until the close of the present session unless the witness shall answer sooner? At this point I will direct the attention of the House to the case of Barth vs. Clise, sheriff, 12 Wallace, 400. I read from page 402. Mr. Justice Swayne delivered the opinion of the court. He says:

By the common law, upon the return of a writ of habeas corpus and the production of the body of the party suing it out, the authority under which the original commitment took place is superseded. After that time, and until the case is finally disposed of, the safe-keeping of the prisoner is entirely under the control and direction of the court to which the return is made. The prisoner is detained, not under the original commitment, but under the authority of the writ of habeas corpus.

And the court therefore held, as the logical sequence of the law thus declared, that the sheriff could not be held responsible for escape of the prisoner while thus in the custody of the court and before a remand or other order placing new duties on him.

Again, if taken before the court in this District for trial, will he not insist upon the right to give bail? Could the court admit him to bail without taking him out of the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms absolutely? If the court should deny him the privilege of giving bail, upon what theory would the refusal be founded except that the House was entitled to the custody of the witness? And if the House during the contumacy of Mr. Kilbourn is entitled to keep him in the custody to which he has been committed, what argument can be made against the adoption of the resolution?

I now ask the attention of members to a view of this question that should not be overlooked.

It is the theory of the witness that all control of the House over him was terminated when the Speaker certified the fact of his failure to testify to the district attorney; and that when he answers to the indictment he answers to the only complaint recognized by the law as lawfully pending against him.

Section 102 requires the witness to give testimony and to produce papers if called for, and makes it a misdemeanor if he refuses to answer any question pertinent to the question under inquiry; and by section 104 it is this refusal or failure to testify that the Speaker is required to certify to the district attorney, and which must by the latter be laid before the grand jury for their action. But the witness has been committed by the House because of his refusal to produce books and papers, as well as on account of his refusal to answer certain questions.

Now, if the certificate of the Speaker need not have alluded to the failure to produce the books and papers; and if, under the rule that penal statutes must be strictly construed, the counts in the indictment predicated upon the refusal to produce the books and papers are invalid because not authorized by the statute, what becomes of the theory and argument of the witness? Will not the House be authorized to still hold the witness even under the theory of the witness, he not having yet produced the books and papers?

I will now close my remarks by reading from the opinion of Judge Mac Arthur, of the supreme court of this District, who refused upon habeas corpus to discharge Richard B. Irwin. I invite special attention to the fact that this opinion was given after most elaborate argument on both sides of the question by counsel eminent and able. And let it not be forgotten that this hearing was had after the revision of 1874, after the words "in addition to existing pains and penalties" had been omitted from the text. He says:

There can be no doubt that either House of Congress has the right of committing for contempts which infringe upon the order, the dignity, or purity of their legislation, and for this purpose it is not denied but they have the power of examination, of investigation, and of calling witnesses into their presence or before their committees, and of administering oaths and putting inquiries, and of punishing a refusal to answer. The powers of the House are so clearly established now that the learned counsel who has argued this morning has not impeached them, unless Congress by the enactment of 1857 has abrogated this almost indispensable power in Congress. It is to be observed that the statute applies only to a particular species of contempt, and that is to witnesses who refuse to answer questions upon subjects of investigation before Congress or before its committees. It is said that inasmuch as Congress has created the act of a witness refusing to answer a misdemeanor they have abolished it as a contempt. I cannot so regard it. It appears to me that the punishment provided in the statute for this as an offense does not merge the contempt, and does not abolish the power of the House. It appears to me that it has not been so understood from the time of the enactment of the statute, and I believe this is the first time that that aspect of the case has ever been presented for judicial examination. There is nothing clearer than that the same act may be both a misdemeanor and contempt. If one member should strike another while the House was in session and in its presence, it would be a contempt of the House, and a misdemeanor under the laws, for which he could be punished. It would be no answer to the proceedings in the House for contempt to say that he was liable under the general law of the land to be punished for the misdemeanor. In the celebrated case of Sam Houston, who was brought before the bar of the House for striking a member of Congress for words spoken in debate, the power of the House to punish him for contempt in the case was disputed; but it was held to be within the power of the House upon the most solemn consideration. And after having been tried, convicted, and punished for contempt by the House, he was prosecuted for misdemeanor, probably in this very court, or, at all events, in one of the local tribunals here. His defense to that action was his conviction before the House for contempt, and that he could not be twice punished for the same offense.

The defense was of course overruled, and Mr. Houston, notwithstanding his distinguished position, having formerly been a member of the House, was punished both for a contempt and for a misdemeanor before the two jurisdictions.

Mr. Speaker, in my judgment it is very clear that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] should be adopted. Unless all authority and precedent should be utterly disregarded, the vote cannot be otherwise.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] How long time does the gentleman want?

Mr. KASSON. I only wish a few minutes. I have no prepared notes.

I am not sorry that this question is again presented to the House for its careful review; and in common with the rest of the House, I feel like making my acknowledgments to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] for his careful and elaborate review of the authorities and precedents upon this subject. I ought, however, to say to him that he has spent a great deal of time, it seems to me, in debating points that do not arise on the question presented to the House by the papers submitted by the Speaker this morning.

There is no question that this House, by precedent, by law, by everything that constitutes authority, has the right to punish for contempt the witnesses who refuse to obey its proper orders. I therefore omit any reference to that part of the argument that relates to that phase of the question. But, Mr. Speaker, there are two points in this case upon which my own mind has been in great difficulty from the beginning of the debate upon the contumacy of this witness. The first is that we have no settled rule that determines the limits of subjects of which this House has the right to take jurisdiction. We have certain classes of subjects over which unquestionably we have jurisdiction: those relating to frauds practiced upon the House; those relating to corruption and attempts at corruption of its members. We have had frequent investigations upon those subjects, and there is no debate about our right to demand and exact from witnesses testimony relating to such matters. Of the question of impeachment the House has unquestionable jurisdiction, because it is conferred by the Constitution, and we have the right to require testimony upon the grounds of impeachment within the range of our powers to impeach. We have the power of legislation, and we wish for information touching that legislation, as in the preparation of a tariff bill; and we may summon before us witnesses from all parts of the country to give information relating to these subjects of legislation.

Now, admitting that there are these classes of subjects over which our jurisdiction is undenied and undeniable, the first question of difficulty in this case is, under what class of subjects pertaining to the clear jurisdiction of this House does this inquiry come upon which the case before us is presented? It is said by the gentleman from Indiana, and I believe he stated the point very carefully, that a certain debtor of the United States, Jay Cooke & Co., having committed an act of bankruptcy, conveyed by force of law to an assignee appointed pursuant to law all their rights and property, and that the United States in common with other creditors of Jay Cooke & Co. are interested in the estate. That is true. It appears, however, in this case that the assignee, under the powers conferred upon him by law, has effected a settlement of Jay Cooke & Co.'s interest in this nondescript thing that is known as a "real-estate pool."

Now the first question that troubles me upon the point of jurisdiction is this, shall the House of Representatives take from the court its jurisdiction in a case of bankruptcy because of any alleged interest of the United States? The court has, it is said, affirmed the settlement made by the assignee with this company or copartnership known as the "real-estate pool." The court has the right to set that settlement aside for fraud, to set it aside for mistake, to re-open it upon any ground that is within the privilege of the citizen or of the Government. The court has that power. Is it pertinent to the jurisdiction of the House to proceed as a prosecuting attorney to find facts in a case where the United States has its agent, its prosecuting attorney, and its court, all of whom have proceeded and acted without any charge of irregularity?

I cannot, with my present conviction, deny the power of the House of Representatives to examine into the action of this assignee in bankruptcy and every action of the court in the case; for if you strain the power of the House you might say that you will discover facts that will justify you in impeaching the very judge by whose sanction the settlement was made. But that is not alleged here. This case has gone to the extremest verge to which I have known the power of the House extended in making inquiries as to matters before the courts; and if you have not by former legislation given power to the assignee and the court to protect fully the interests of the United States, I should be obliged to admit and assert that it was your duty to see what further legislation is demanded by making this investigation and then enacting such legislation. But with the power as complete as it is, with no allegation of a fraudulent settlement, with no allegation of misconduct on the part of the court, I submit it to the judgment of the House that you are on this point using discretionary power probably vested in you with more danger to the rights and personal liberties of the citizen than probability of good to the United States.

Here, then, I leave that subject, and simply state as my proposition, when the appeal is now made properly to the discretion of the House, that on a review of its own order and investigation the House ought not to take this doubtful power, as against the court, for the punishment of the witness.

The second point to which I wish to call the attention of the House arises in the statute of the United States referred to by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] We have now a law of Congress, to which of course this House assented, directing a certain punishment for contumacious witnesses. We have directed the very mode of proceeding against that witness. The Speaker, in pursuance of that law, has brought this witness before one of the courts of the country. The court, exercising its jurisdiction, has found a bill of indictment against him and presented him for a violation of law. The report is made here now that we in holding this witness prevent the administration of the law of Congress by the court; and therefore the question is now presented to the House, Shall we, under the name of punishment for contempt, prohibit by our own action, as one House of Congress, the execution of the duty of the courts enjoined upon them by the power of the two Houses in a formal act of Congress?

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. KASSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Do we prevent it? Do we do anything more than postpone it?

Mr. KASSON. We prevent it by postponing for the reason that a delay in justice may be repeated every session; at every session the same witness may be brought up again and the court permanently deprived of the power to punish this witness so long as there is a Congress in session.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. KASSON. Not just now; allow me to finish what I have to say on this point. Thus, while the position that I desire the House shall not take may be within the discretion of the House, I think they should not put themselves in an attitude of hostility to the courts of the land in exercising an authority that Congress, embracing this House, has imposed upon the courts. They cannot try this contumacious witness until he is before them. They cannot even get from him a plea of guilty or not guilty until he is before them at the bar on a criminal proceeding. This difficulty is not before the House for the first time, and I beg gentlemen to observe that I am now submitting to their discretion, and not as a matter of right, the action they ought to take under the circumstances. I am not certain, sir, as to the right of the House to pursue the punishment of this witness for contempt in the face of that statute and judicial action thereon, because the statute seems to have put a limitation on the power of one House of Congress by providing that the identical contempt shall be punished in another manner and by another tribunal; and they have put a limitation on the extent of punishment by fixing a maximum fine and a maximum term of imprisonment.

Now, sir, we for that same offense are doing two things: we are insisting that our punishment for contempt shall go on to its extremest verge, to the expiration of this congressional term of ours, and at the same time insisting that the punishment provided by the law of the United States shall not commence until our entire power is exhausted. I submit that this is an extreme position for the House to take. Still, not affirming that we have no right to continue our punishment for contempt, I appeal to the discretion of the House, whether there is not more danger of our violating the rights of a free citizen of this country, in subjecting him to be punished for the same offense to the extreme limit of our power and of the law, than there is in following the first precedent established by this House under this law.

The law now found in the Revised Statutes was passed in 1857. The very next year—I beg gentlemen to observe this fact—the very next year a question came up involving its application to a recusant witness. Mr. Alexander H. Stephens, of Georgia, was a member of the House at the time. While the law and the objects of the law were present in the minds of the members, a question arose for its application. What did this House do under similar circumstances, when, as I say, their minds were fresh with the motives and the purposes that controlled Congress in that act of legislation? Did they refuse to let the witness go before the court, or did they say that, having provided a substitute remedy and having by a law of Congress named the punishment, the contumacious witness should be turned over to the court for that punishment?

I find in the Journal of this House for the first session of the Thirty-fifth Congress, under date of March 22, 1858, in the case of John W. Wolcott, who was in jail for a contempt of the House, that Mr. Alexander H. Stephens offered the preamble and resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas, on the 15th day of February last, this House by its resolution did commit John W. Wolcott to the jail of the District of Columbia for an infringement of the privileges of the House in refusing satisfactorily to answer certain questions put to him by order of the House, and is still held in custody under said order; and whereas afterward, in pursuance of the provisions of law, the Speaker of the House did certify to the district attorney of the District of Columbia the facts pertaining to said case, and the same were laid before the grand jury of said District, and a presentment was thereupon found against said Wolcott for the same offense; and whereas the court in which said presentment is pending have determined that said Wolcott cannot be tried on said presentment so long as this House holds him in custody under its rights of privilege: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and directed to cause said Wolcott to be released from jail, and to deliver him over to the marshal of said District of Columbia, or other person authorized to receive him, to answer to the presentment pending in said court.

Mr. KASSON. Observe the identical condition of facts and of the witness. The witness had been contumacious; he was sent to jail for a contempt; the Speaker had certified to the prosecuting authorities, under this very law, that he had thus been guilty of a contempt of the House; the grand jury had found a presentment, but the court could not try the witness because the House still held him.

Now what did that House do? I do not wish to refer to any political majority, but in passing I may say that the political majority of that House was the same as the political majority of this. What did that House do? Instead of insisting upon their right to punish still longer, to the expiration of that Congress, they said: "A remedy has been provided by law; fines and imprisonment have been designated by the supreme legislative authority of the country; and without saying that we have no right to hold him still longer, we turn him over to the court to be tried as other citizens are tried for offenses committed against the law." And this was the very next year after the law in question was passed.

Now, I submit to gentlemen that with a precedent like that, of which I did not hear the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] speak, it is our duty to proceed with cautious steps before we say that as one House we will refuse to a citizen and refuse to a court the power to execute the provisions of the law.

To that resolution of Mr. Stephens amendments were offered, presenting other phases of the question, and the yeas and nays were called upon them. The subject was very carefully considered. Mr. Phillips offered a substitute proposing a modification of the order, and the substitute was voted down on the yeas and nays—yeas 59, nays 123. Another amendment was offered by Mr. Hughes, modifying it still further, and that was voted down by the yeas and nays—yeas 22, nays 161. And finally the House came back to the resolution of Mr. Stephens, which I have had read by the Clerk, and that resolution was adopted on a yea and nay vote—yeas 125, nays 67. The precedent, therefore, is so complete and so conclusive that I have ventured to detain the House thus long in bringing it before them for consideration, and asking them whether it is not more discreet for us to follow that first precedent than it is to adopt a new one in contradiction of it.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] to allow me to offer a substitute for his resolution.

Mr. GLOVER. I will permit it to be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to deliver Hallet Kilbourn, now in his custody for contempt, to the marshal of the District of Columbia, to be brought before the proper legal tribunal for trial according to the course of law for a misdemeanor for which he is now under indictment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no desire to discuss the substitute.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] yield to allow this substitute to be received and voted upon?

Mr. GLOVER. I do not.

Mr. KASSON. I think it would be better to allow at least one amendment to be offered; that has always been done in similar cases.

Mr. GLOVER. I must decline.

Mr. HURLBUT. This presents a very grave question, and I think there should be much consideration allowed to it.

Mr. GLOVER. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER.]

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, I do not think this matter presents quite so grave a question for the consideration of the House as my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] seemed to imagine. The very able and exhaustive argument which has been submitted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] upon the legal questions presented places this matter, it seems to me, properly before the House for consideration. But in considering the request which has been presented by the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House through the Speaker and in arriving at a just conclusion we should understand precisely the character of the laws existing upon the subject.

I do not understand the gentleman from Iowa or any one else to say that the position assumed by the gentleman from Indiana is not well founded in law. I do not understand it to be denied that long anterior to the passage of the act of 1857 or the amendatory statute of 1862 the inherent power to punish witnesses for contempt existed in this House, as it has always existed in the Parliament of England, and must necessarily by the very nature of their constitution exist in all deliberative assemblies of this character.

The argument of the gentleman from Iowa is that you must go behind the adjudication of the House and take into consideration the question whether or not the judgment of the House which is of record was properly entered. I take it for granted, Mr. Speaker, that that question will not enter into the consideration or proper determination of the question now before the House. It is, in the language of the law-books and the courts, so far as the attitude of the party referred to is concerned, res adjudicata. He is in contempt of the power and authority of the House in refusing to answer; and it is too late now to attempt to amend the record and go behind the adjudication which has been solemnly made that the party was in contempt of the House and should be imprisoned.

It has been very well observed, Mr. Speaker, by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] that when the House had passed its judgment and the party was committed that commitment was execution of the sentence of the House; and being execution of the sentence of a court of competent jurisdiction, possessing jurisdiction over both the person and the subject-matter, it was not possible that any other tribunal could intervene and intercept the proper execution of the judgment which the House had pronounced. To consent to the request now made and to surrender the witness from the execution of the judgment of the House would be to allow another jurisdiction to intervene to prevent the execution of the sentence and judgment which the House has pronounced. Nothing is more common than for a party who has been proceeded against in one State—oftentimes under extradition treaties and laws—to be removed from one State to another to answer for another penal offense. But never has it been insisted that when the jurisdiction has attached in one State for one offense and the party is either under the process of trial, or under the process of judgment and sentence, a foreign jurisdiction could take possession of the case.

It has been asserted, and was asserted by the contumacious witness in his statement as an excuse for his failure to answer, that the peculiar phraseology of the law of 1857 with regard to witnesses had been changed by the act of 1862. I do not so find it. I have here the original act of 1857, which I send to the Clerk's desk that the first and second sections may be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House of Congress, and to compel them to discover testimony.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress, who shall willfully make default, or who, appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry in consideration before the House or committee by which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and on conviction shall pay a fine not exceeding $1,000 and not less than $100, and suffer imprisonment in the common jail not less than one month nor more than twelve months.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That no person examined and testifying before either House of Congress or any committee of either House shall be held to answer criminally in any court of justice, or subject to any penalty or forfeiture for any fact or act touching which he shall be required to testify before either House of Congress or any committee of either House as to which he shall have testified, whether before or after the date of this act, and that no statement made or paper produced by any witness before either House of Congress or before any committee of either House shall be competent testimony in any criminal proceeding against such witness in any court of justice; and no witness shall hereafter be allowed to refuse to testify to any fact or to produce any paper touching which he shall be examined by either House of Congress or any committee of either House for the reason that his testimony touching such fact or the production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt any witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed by him in testifying as aforesaid.

Mr. HOOKER. It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the language of the act of 1857 is that the penalties imposed by it are in addition to the penalties already existing by law. By what law? Not by statutory enactment, I take it, but by the universal law which empowers all deliberative bodies having jurisdiction to investigate questions of fraud, to punish by the ordinary process of imprisonment for contempt of their authority.

It has been said that the peculiar phraseology of the first section of the act of 1857 has been changed by the amendatory act of 1862. It will be observed by the very title of the act that it is designed to apply to an authority of the courts of law to punish, in addition to the power to punish which already existed in the House. I now send to the Clerk's desk to be read the amendatory act of January 24, 1862, as it appears in the Statutes at Large.

An act amending the provisions of the second section of the act of January 24, 1857, enforcing the attendance of witnesses before committees of either House of Congress.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the provisions of the second section of the act entitled "An act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses on the summons of either House of Congress, and to compel them to discover testimony," approved January 24, 1857, be amended, altered, and repealed, so as to read as follows: That the testimony of a witness examined and testifying before either House of Congress, or any committee of either House of Congress, shall not be used as evidence in any criminal proceeding against such witness in any court of justice: Provided, however, That no official paper or record produced by such witness on such examination shall be held or taken to be included within the privilege of said evidence, so as to protect such witness from any criminal proceeding as aforesaid; and no witness shall hereafter be allowed to refuse to testify to any fact, or to produce any paper, touching which he shall be examined by either House of Congress or any committee of either House for the reason that his testimony touching such fact or the production of such paper may tend to disgrace him or otherwise render him infamous: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to exempt any witness from prosecution and punishment for perjury committed by him in testifying as aforesaid.

Mr. HOOKER. Mr. Speaker, it will be observed by the House that the act of 1862 is amendatory of the second section of the act of 1857 and of that second section alone; that it does not apply or have reference to any other portion of the act of 1857 than that second section. Now the second section of the act of 1857 was legislation with a view to protect the witness himself, and the act of 1862 was simply amendatory of the act of 1857 so far as it had regard to that question. By looking to the first section of the act of 1857, which is unchanged and unaltered by the amendment of 1862, it will be found to retain the same language which is claimed now to be excluded from the law by virtue of the revision.

I have alluded to this matter, Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of saying it never has been denied that power did exist on the part of the House. The simple question now arises did this infliction of penalty, did this subjection of the party to prosecution before a court of criminal jurisdiction deprive this House of its power to punish for contempt? If the House can respond to the demand of such a court that this witness shall be surrendered, if it be the duty of the House as insisted by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that such is our duty, then it would leave this House powerless to enforce its authority to compel witnesses to answer in any case. Allow me to illustrate. Suppose you respond to the demand of a court of criminal jurisdiction by surrender of the party in contempt, indictment is found to-morrow, and the trial takes place the next day, and the jury should acquit the defendant of any offense under the law as it now stands, where then would be the power of the House to protect itself against the contempt of a contumacious witness? It would not exist, sir. And, in addition to that, suppose you surrender the party in contempt by solemn judgment of the House and now undergoing sentence, suppose you surrender him and an indictment is found and it shall remain pending as indictments often do for years, then this party would have the right, this being one of that character of cases bailable under the Constitution—he would have the right at once to come into court, and, giving bail, escape the penalty which the House has imposed upon him in protection of its just authority against the contempt of which he has been guilty. So that in either event, whether an acquittal should occur or conviction should ensue or the indictment should remain pending in the court for years, it would strip this House of its power to punish parties guilty of contempt in defying its authority. If this sort of subterfuge could be resorted to, then indeed would this House be powerless to any extent to compel the attendance of any witness, and you would have the astounding spectacle of the highest court, like the Parliament of England, powerless to enforce its own order, impotent to compel the attendance and obtain the testimony of witnesses.

This question has been fully and completely settled by the rule laid down by Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, one paragraph of which has been already cited by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] Another paragraph, No. 950, applies to the same subject. It is as follows:

950. Witnesses that have been taken into or are in custody for disobeying the order of the House for their attendance or for keeping out of the way or absconding are usually committed to Newgate, by way of punishment for their offense, from whence, while thus undergoing their punishment, they are brought in custody to the house, or before a committee, to give their evidence, whenever their testimony is wanted, the speaker's warrant being ordered to be issued for that purpose.

It is perfectly self-evident if a witness under the circumstances we have now before us can be removed by a court of criminal jurisdiction from the custody of this House, it will be simply impossible on the part of this House to secure that testimony which it needs, and which it is important it should have in the faithful discharge of its public duties.

I read from the same book section 1011, which recites the rule with still more emphasis:

When a witness refuses to answer the questions which he is directed to answer, or to produce a paper or other document, the proceeding against him is intended not only as a punishment for his contempt, but also to compel him to obey the order. For these purposes a contumacious witness is usually committed, in the first instance, to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms. If this fails to induce him to submit himself to the order, he may then be committed to Newgate or some other public prison. Instances have occurred in which the confinement of a witness has been accompanied with circumstances of severity, intended to bring him to submission;

as, for example, in the year 1742 in the case of Nicholas Paxton, who for refusing to answer the questions put to him by the secret committee to inquire into the conduct of the Earl of Oxford was in the first instance committed to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms and debarred the use of paper, pen, and ink, and, persisting in his refusal, was then committed a close prisoner to Newgate, the house at the same time ordering that he be not allowed pen, ink, or paper; that no person be permitted to have access to him without leave of the house; that his wife have leave to remain with him during the time of his confinement, but that she be not allowed pen, ink, or paper; and that no person have access to her without leave of the house. In this case the severity with which Paxton was treated proved ineffectual, and the house, finding it impossible to compel him, with some others, to answer, resorted to the expedient of passing a bill of indemnity; but this being rejected by the House of Lords, the inquiry was of course defeated. Other instances of the same kind occur in the journals. In the year 1809, on the occasion of the inquiry with reference to the conduct of the Duke of York, it being proposed to commit one of the witnesses (Mrs. Clarke) to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms with orders to deny her access to any person whatever, the speaker said: "The house ought to pause before they come to a decision upon a point in which the liberty of the subject was so materially concerned." There seems to be no reason to doubt that the house may put a contumacious witness into close confinement, and this in fact was all that was done in Paxton's and other cases of the same kind, accompanied with such restraints from communication with other persons as it may deem necessary to prevent the ends of public justice from being frustrated; but whether this right should be exercised or not in any given case is a question deserving of very grave and careful consideration.

It will be observed that the power of the House to imprison for contempt of its authority, to coerce an answer from a witness, is not confined simply to confinement as a punishment for the contempt, but it is a continuing penalty, designed and intended to be held over the party while in the custody of the officer of the House, in order to compel him to answer. And this is the great object and purpose the law has in clothing the House with such power and authority. If it be in the power of any court, high or low—and I know none which under the Constitution and laws of this land is higher than this House, while investigating matters of public interest—if it be in the power of any court to take a witness from the custody of the House, and subject him exclusively to the jurisdiction of a court of criminal jurisdiction, there to undergo trial under the ordinary law, then you strip this House of all power to continue the imprisonment of a witness in order to coerce his answer. The bare statement of the proposition carries conviction with it, and it is unnecessary to add argument to illustrate it.

If this demand is not responded to in the way that is suggested by the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri, in reference to all the great questions of investigation which are now engaging its attention, and which will continue to do so probably during the remainder of this session of Congress, in reference to all these questions of investigation in which the public weal and the public interest are so much concerned, the House would be stripped of its power to coerce the attendance of witnesses, to compel answers and to compel the production of papers, and all your investigations, all your inquiries, would drop perfectly idle before any contumacious witness who might choose to shelter himself under this proceeding and procure an indictment in a criminal court, and thus escape the custody of the House and the punishment of the House; and we would have the spectacle of this solemn adjudication that the party was in contempt set at naught by every contumacious witness who might be brought before the House for the purpose of having any matter investigated.

Mr. GLOVER. I withdraw my objection to the substitute of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] being received.

Mr. HURLBUT. I now offer that substitute.

The SPEAKER. The amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT,] in the nature of a substitute, will be regarded as pending.

Mr. COX. Let us look at this matter from a practical stand-point. By article 1 section 5 of the Constitution, it is provided that the House may make its own rules and regulate its own proceedings. Under this clause of the Constitution, as well as by our rules and general parliamentary law, we summon witnesses and when they refuse their evidence and are in contempt we can enforce testimony.

Mr. Cushing says in his manual that a contumacious witness for refusing to testify may be punished by the House as well as dealt with so as to compel his testimony. It will be sufficient for my purpose to regard the statute which has been enacted and quoted as for the punishment of a misdemeanor, and the procedure of Congress, as intended to enforce testimony. All proceedings against witnesses, which are taken by the District court, whether as in the Irwin case on the writ of habeas corpus, or as in the present case by indictment and warrant, all of them, as the gentleman from Misssissippi [Mr. HOOKER] has well said, are continuing, or rather cumulative proceedings.

It does not follow because you, Mr. Speaker, under the law (Revised Statutes, section 104) certified the proceedings and facts in relation to the Kilbourn contempt to the district attorney of the District of Columbia, (whose duty it is to lay them before the grand jury,) that therefore they are to go to work at once and indict the witness and thus oust us of our jurisdiction as to breaches of privilege. You had, sir, a right, nay it was your duty, to certify those proceedings within a reasonable time. You performed that duty. You will be held entirely free from any consequences, litigious or otherwise. Nor can any officer of this House for the performance of his duty, in the arrest and confinement of the witness, be held to any account to any tribunal outside of this House.

Mr. STEVENSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question.

Mr. COX. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENSON. I wish to ask him what object the law could have in requiring the Speaker to certify to the court of the District of Columbia these proceedings unless it gives that court jurisdiction?

Mr. COX. The court may have jurisdiction, and as a predicate to that jurisdiction the certificate of the Speaker may be sent; but does it follow that the prosecution in the District court may not be pursued after our jurisdiction is ended and the penalty we inflict suffered? After one punishment, if I may call it so, by this House to compel the testimony or the production of the books of the pool, is the punishment of this recusant witness ended? Will not the indictment be still pending? May we not in our own discretion postpone any action delegating the case to the courts, and refuse to yield up the witness to the district court of the District of Columbia?

No, sir, the main point should not be forgotten. It never has been forgotten in this House in similar cases, notwithstanding the precedent quoted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] There is no outside or judicial authority that can take from Congress the high right which primarily belongs to it as a quasi-court, punishing for the contempt of its order. Parliament has been called a court in the citations made by gentlemen. It is a court for a purpose, as Congress is. Congress has a right like other courts to compel its witnesses by subpœnas duces tecum and other processes to fulfill its orders.

This whole matter was reviewed on the 15th of January, 1875, in the Irwin case. It was also discussed in the Stewart case. In the former there was scarcely any objection to our proceeding as now proposed by any except the (then) gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Butler, and the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. Stephens, who offered the resolution in 1857 which has been quoted by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] They agreed that a law should be passed to carry out the Constitution, which had not the necessary vigor within itself for the purpose of coercing testimony. They argued that, a law having been passed for the punishment of contumacious witnesses by the District court, therefore we had lost our jurisdiction as to the breach and contempt over the witness. The same argument was repeated the other day in the paper read here by the witness; but it was not considered good on either occasion. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] fully answered it in the Irwin case, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] himself answered it in part. It seems to me that he is inconsistent in his position at the present time, for he then said:

> We are not advised that anybody disputes it or disputes the right of the House to hold this witness in custody. I submit that the only question before the House is, Have we the right, under the provision of the Revised Statutes of the United States which I have read, to prevent our Sergeant-at-Arms by our order from obeying the order of the court under the writ which the judge has issued?

That was in the case of a writ of habeas corpus issued by the district judge.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will allow me to say that in the Irwin case the indictment was not found until after the adjournment of Congress.

Mr. COX. In the Irwin case we were met by a writ of habeas corpus. Its sanctity and its venerableness were urged against the doubtful power of Congress. Was it not some six or seven hundred years old, and entitled to all respect as the organic law of liberty? Was it not issued by the authority of Congress in pursuance of a Federal statute for such cases provided? And then it was urged vehemently that you could not set aside the great writ of habeas corpus even to vindicate the supremacy of Congress.

Well, Mr. Speaker, if in such a serious matter as the habeas corpus issued in pursuance of the requirements of our own Federal law we could disregard the court, a fortiori why can we not disregard a little court that sits here in the District of Columbia presuming to take such cognizance as to oust Congress of its right of enforcing reluctant evidence for great purposes?

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will remember that did not set aside the writ.

Mr. COX. The gentleman, for the purpose of vindicating the rights of the House at that time, said these words:

> The court has no power to make an order on our Sergeant-at-Arms because he is not an officer of the court. If he were, and therefore under the jurisdiction of the court, he would be all right. But he cannot give an order to our Sergeant-at-Arms at all. Consequently if he neglects to make an order to an officer whom he has the right to control, then under that decision the witness would be free from any control.

The gentleman argued then, if I understand him, that the court in the District of Columbia could not affect our jurisdiction or interfere with our officers; and I cannot for the life of me see the pertinency of his argument to-day that, under the statute quoted, an indictment found by a court can so interpose as to deprive us of jurisdiction and take the witness from the custody of our officer.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman will permit me, of course, to state that my argument was addressed to the discretion of the House. I did not deny the right or jurisdiction of the House.

Mr. COX. If I wanted the authority of gentlemen on the other side of the House I would quote what Mr. DAWES and Mr. Tremaine said, vindicating our absolute control of the subject. Besides, there was Judge LAWRENCE, who made an exhaustive speech on the subject, with citations, full, pertinent, and conclusive, for the power of the House in these matters of recusant testimony and committee investigations. Had I time I could quote what was then pithily said by a then member from Massachusetts, honorable Ex-Attorney-General, Mr. Hoar, when he rose up (I remember it well) and said: "Suppose I were a judge, and was trying a case of murder, and the judge of another court of equal jurisdiction should undertake by some process of habeas corpus or otherwise to take that prisoner from under my jurisdiction; would I yield to him? No, sir;" and he made the analogy perfect to the case then pending of Irwin. It was not so strong a case as this for our assertion of parliamentary prerogative, but its analogy is sufficient to answer objections. It was a true analogy, and the gentleman cannot gainsay it unless he wishes, and gentlemen on the other side of the House wish utterly to annul our power to legislate and our right to investigate. What use is there of the outlay of the thousands of dollars which we will have to spend to develop the hidden badness of republican administration, if by a little tribunal in the District you can stop it at the threshold by a convenient indictment? Is it not the same as saying to every witness summoned, "When you refuse to answer, Mr. Witness, you shall not be punished here, where your breach was committed and your contempt shown; when you refuse to produce your books under the subpœna duces tecum you shall have entire immunity here. You shall be certified to a court of peculiar jurisdiction, if not peculiar favor, and there you may kindly remain under indictment, perhaps in custody, or be admitted to bail, or be enlarged under a writ of habeas corpus; or, in fine, in any event, you may refuse your books, or to tell the truth, or conceal important facts, even against the call of the Congress of the United States, representing the majesty and honesty of the people; and for such contumacy and contempt you may not only foil investigation, but go unwhipped of justice."

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.]

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say a very few words on this question, and more especially to allude to one point which some of the gentlemen do not seem to have clearly comprehended.

I suppose that two things must be taken as settled: First, that the House of Representatives have the power to investigate facts through their committees in aid of their power of impeachment and in aid of their power of legislation; second, that the House has the same right to punish for contempt that courts of justice have. I suppose that whether a contempt of this House be a crime or not, it is punishable in the discretion of the House as a contempt. Suppose a person should come into the gallery of this House, or should force his way on the floor, and by disorderly or profane speech interrupt the proceedings of this House. Now, although there be no existing statute which makes that act a crime or a misdemeanor, it is a necessity of the exercise of legislative power that this body should have the right to punish that act as for a contempt.

The limit of the right of punishment by this House is exactly the same as in the case of the courts. The question has been asked, can this House sentence a witness to the rack, or to be hanged, or to be drawn and quartered? I have no doubt that this power of punishment has two limitations: first, that it can be exercised only by the accustomed power of fine and imprisonment, and, second, that such imprisonment must expire with the session of the House that inflicts it. In other words, there being no pardoning power for a contempt of the House, the imprisonment is always subject to be revised or revoked in the discretion of the House itself. Therefore a sentence to be imprisoned for contempt implies that the imprisonment is subject to the further or other order of the House, and therefore it must, in its nature, end when the session of the House expires.

Now, in the exercise of that power this House is the supreme or highest judicial tribunal. Our sentence for a contempt has precisely the same authority, and is as absolutely beyond the right of revision by any other tribunal, as the sentence of the Chief Justice and his associates of the Supreme Court sitting in the other end of this Capitol would be in the case of a contempt of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would inquire of the gentleman why a judgment of this House pronounced upon a contumacious witness in contempt, if the judgment is valid at the time it is pronounced, must necessarily expire with the expiration of the life of this House any more than a valid judgment pronounced by a court expires with the termination of the commission of the judge of that court?

Mr. HOAR. To use a very simple analogy or illustration, I would refer to the order of a divorce court granting alimony to a wife in a suit against her husband. Though such an order is an absolute judgment, it cannot be enforced in any other State or country than that in which it is rendered. And why? Because the nature of the subject-matter of alimony is that it is constantly subject to revision by the power that pronounced it; it is not a final judgment, and in my opinion this judgment of the House is like that. That, however, is merely an introductory matter.

I was coming to this simple point, more particularly in answer to the argument of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.] We are for this purpose a supreme court. A witness has come into this supreme court; a question has been put to him by the direction of this supreme court, and he has refused to answer, and this supreme court has ordered that he be committed to the custody of the marshal or sheriff to be detained until he will answer. That is the precise condition of Hallet Kilbourn before this court to-day.

In the first place, it is said that this court, this House, erred in taking jurisdiction of the subject-matter to which the inquiry related. Well, the answer to that is obvious; it is altogether too late to raise and discuss that question. Who ever heard, in determining how a witness should be punished for a contempt, of revising the judgment of the court in determining to entertain jurisdiction over the case?

In the next place it is said you ought not to have made the adjudication requiring an answer to that question, that it was an erroneous adjudication. It seems to me it is equally too late to raise that point now; all that has been settled; and it does not properly come before us at this time. I think myself that, before ordering this investigation originally, this House ought to have required a charge from some responsible source, not of a crime against any one, but of the probability that the investigation would reveal matters fit for the criminal jurisdiction and the legislative remedies of this House. I think the House should have been more careful in limiting that question which, although it had a perfect right to put it, still seems to trench somewhat on the constitutional provision which protects the private papers of a citizen. But all these questions have passed by.

This witness has refused to answer the question put to him by the House, and the House, as a court, has said to its Sergeant-at-Arms, its marshal: "Detain this witness until he is willing to answer." Now I do not regard this as a punishment for contempt, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] seems to do, and as seems in part to have been taken for granted by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. NEW.] This House, as a court, may do two things; it may punish him by sentencing him to imprisonment for disobeying its order, or it may order him to be held and detained until he will answer. The one is punishment; the other is coercion. We are to-day simply dealing with the case of an order to detain the witness until he shall come in and say he will answer; nothing else. We have the right to let him go. We have the right, after he has come in and fully answered, to inflict upon him, if we see fit in our discretion, a further punishment for his contempt.

Mr. KASSON. With permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts, I would be glad to recall his attention to the illustration of the Supreme Court punishing a witness for contempt. I think it is a sort of tribute to the strength of my argument that all gentlemen are endeavoring to put this upon the question of right.

Mr. HOAR. I do not yield for discussion, but for a question.

Mr. KASSON. Well, then, suppose the Supreme Court found a law on the statute-book providing a punishment for the same offense, what does the gentleman suppose the court would do?

Mr. HOAR. This House is detaining the witness until he will answer. Now we are met by the suggestion which the gentleman from Iowa has recalled to my mind, that a statute of the United States has laid down the authority to punish for contempt and committed it to a police court somewhere, with the result which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HOOKER] so clearly and admirably stated, upon the dignity and prerogatives of this House. Now, my answer to that in the first place is that no statute can deprive this House of any power which is incident to the capacities with which it is clothed by the Constitution itself. One House of Representatives cannot lay down the prerogatives or authority of its successors. Nothing short of an amendment to the Constitution can within its proper limits qualify or control the exercise of this constitutional power to punish for contempt any more than a statute could change the proportion of members needed for a call of the yeas and nays.

But, in the next place, it was not the intent of the statute to deprive the House of this power. It is a historical fact that the revision of the statutes was not intended to change the law in any particular. Every clause of that volume went through this House by unanimous consent, and through the Senate without either reading or debate, on the assurance, first, of the revisers, and second, of a very distinguished and able committee of this House, that the existing law was not changed in the smallest particular. That is the principle of construction with regard to this statute. Therefore, as has been said by the gentleman from Mississippi, it is to read as if it said in terms, "in addition to the pains and penalties to which the witness would be otherwise subject."

It was not the intention of that statute to authorize any court to administer the punishment of contempt. Many offenses may be contempt against this House and also crimes against the justice of the United States. Suppose a person comes into this House and strikes the Speaker; he is punishable for assault and battery by a criminal court; he is also punishable by the House for the contempt of its authority.

We come, therefore, it seems to me, upon the ground taken by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] in which I am happy to agree with him, that this is a question of pure discretion. Now is it wise for this House, in the exercise of its discretion, to surrender to the criminal court of the District this recusant witness now held in custody as a means of coercion until he will answer? Suppose Hallet Kilbourn, instead of being indicted by the grand jury for this offense, had been indicted for a murder. In that case, I have no doubt we should all—the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. HOOKER,] as well as the rest of us—agree that the public justice of the country required that so grave a crime as murder should be punished even if the capacity of the House to use the murderer as a witness should be destroyed and the investigation fall to the ground. But here is a case where the trial and punishment which may follow the indictment by the grand jury can just as well be had after the adjournment of the session of this House as they can to-day. In this case, also, the giving up of the witness is not simply to give up our power to punish for contempt, but our power to coerce him to stay and testify. He can give bail and be on his way to Canada in twenty minutes after he reaches that court-house. This is a case, also, where to surrender him under these circumstances is, it seems to me, to surrender with him the dignity and prerogatives of the House itself. Are we to submit to a grand jury summoned by the executive officers of this District; are we to submit to a petit jury required to give a unanimous verdict; are we to submit to a judge of an inferior court, the power of vindicating the outraged prerogatives and dignity of the House of Representatives, and to surrender at the same time our power to prosecute at our discretion such inquiry as either for purposes of legislation or for purposes of punishment we may see fit to institute?

Now while I agree with the gentleman from Iowa that this is a question of discretion, while he agrees with me that we have the power to hold the man, I differ from him when he maintains that in the case under consideration it is proper for us to discharge the man from our control and leave him to the tender mercies or the not tender mercies of the court. Why, sir, these precedents ought to be considered as permanent, without regard to the existing attitude of politics or political parties to-day. Will any person who regards the dignity and honor of the House of Representatives say that it is discreet in the House to remit to a court whose members are appointed by another branch of the Government, who may at some time have different views of public policy from either of the legislative branches, the power of vindicating the dignity of these bodies by punishing persons who commit contempts upon them, or of determining the range of the inquiries that they may make?

As I said the other day, I think our friends on the other side of the House erred in not giving more careful consideration to the grave question of constitutional liberty which lay at the foundation of this particular inquiry. I think all these steps should be taken under rules and on principles and with considerations which will make every one of them a precedent, which through all the changes of parties, through all the changes of public sentiment, may stand, protecting the life and liberty of honest citizens on the one side and the dignity of the Legislature of the United States on the other.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. McCRARY.]

Mr. McCRARY. When this matter came originally before the House in the form of a resolution for the imprisonment of Mr. Kilbourn, it struck me that it presented a very serious and very grave question. And if that question had been then discussed I am not sure I should have been able to reach the conclusion that it presented a case which justified the House in ordering his commitment to jail for a refusal to answer a proper question as a witness. But, sir, that question has been decided; it has been decided by this House, and I hold there is no authority in any court of the country, or in any other tribunal anywhere, to review or to reverse that decision. Mr. Kilbourn is now held by order of the House for contempt of the House.

The House has decided he is in contempt, its judgment has been finally rendered, and the only question which fairly and legitimately arises at this stage of the proceedings is whether, when the House has ordered a witness into custody for contempt, it ought to deliver that witness over to the courts for trial under an indictment. I concede it is a question within the discretion of the House. The House has undoubtedly the power to turn this person over to the custody of the court, but it presents to my mind a very serious and a very grave question whether it would be safe for the House to set the precedent of yielding to a demand of this character. There is no question as to the power of the House to hold in confinement a recusant witness. On that question the authorities are uniform and abundant.

The House has the power to imprison for two purposes. It may punish a person for contempt, whether that person be a witness or not, for disorderly behavior in the presence of the House, and for a great many offenses which would constitute contempt of the order and dignity of the House. The House may imprison for another purpose, and that is for the purpose of compelling the disclosure of material testimony in the investigation of a subject which the House has the right to inyestigate. A witness who is imprisoned under this power, under the power to compel an answer to a proper question, may release himself from imprisonment, may relieve himself from punishment, may open the prison doors and go free, whenever he chooses to make the required disclosure.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I say it is a serious question whether it would be safe to concede that a witness who is held for contempt shall be turned over to another tribunal for trial. It is said the statute has something to do with it. I think it has nothing whatever to do with it. The statute makes the offense of refusing to answer a misdemeanor, but it by no means abolishes the same as a contempt of the House. It is an additional punishment which may be inflicted, and I apprehend the reason actuating the Congress which enacted the law may have been this: in many cases contempt is committed at the very close of a Congress. Perhaps the utmost the House can do is to commit a man to prison for a day or two—possibly only for a few hours. The utter inadequacy of such a remedy as this, no doubt suggested to Congress in 1857 the propriety of adding some further punishment in a case of that character; but it was only additional punishment, only a cumulative remedy, and did not interfere with the power of the House to hold the witness until he should answer proper questions.

Such was the decision in the case of Mr. Irwin, to which attention has been called. He was arraigned for refusing to answer a question as a witness. A writ of habeas corpus was issued by one of the courts of this District. The question was debated in this House at considerable length, as to whether it would permit the body of Irwin to be taken before the court in order that the court might pass upon the question of its right to hold him. After debate it was ordered that the Sergeant-at-Arms should take the prisoner into the presence of the court, retaining possession and custody of him, until the court should decide the question. The court decided the statute did not give to the court any right to take the person out of the hands of the House of Representatives. The judge in delivering his opinion declared that the statute of 1857 gave as an additional and cumulative remedy the right to punish the witness, but did not deprive the House of its jurisdiction to hold and punish the offender for contempt. The court refused to release him under the habeas corpus and ordered him back into the custody of the House.

I think, sir, it is a question in the discretion of the House. That discretion should be exercised so in no degree to waive or give up the power of the House to hold persons in its custody to compel them to disclose facts which the House has a right to inquire into, and require the disclosure of.

If the question were now whether the questions put to this witness were questions the House has a right to put, whether in attempting to compel this disclosure we are not encroaching upon the jurisdiction of the courts of the country—that, Mr. Speaker, would present other and important considerations about which I confess I should have serious doubts; but as I have said, that question has been adjudicated; it has been decided.

We cannot now consider the correctness of the original judgment unless for the purpose of setting it aside. The case, therefore, as it presents itself to-day, involves the question whether the House ought as a rule—as a policy—to insist upon its right to hold and imprison contumacious witnesses who refuse to give information. In this view we are making a precedent for all future cases, and I am therefore in favor of the adoption of the pending resolution.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. I do not propose to discuss the rights of the House in this case. I have been too much occupied with other things to satisfy my own mind on that point. I do not therefore propose to commit even my own judgment on that very grave and important question; but waiving the question of our right, and assuming for the purpose of my argument that the relation of the House to this question from the start has been wholly one of discretion, I wish to address myself for a moment to that question of discretion.

I take it for granted that there is some danger that we shall be misled by the analogy of the courts. We are a quasi-judicial body, but we shall go far wrong in our conclusions if we treat ourselves as a court, in answering the court that has just addressed us asking for the body of our contumacious witness. I say we shall go far wrong if we treat the House of Representatives in that light, following that analogy.

But there are some things that courts and congresses and houses of representatives and people everywhere must pay heed to, at least as a matter of good conscience and discretion. Now, I wish to refresh the minds of gentlemen for a moment with a reference to the fourth article of amendments to the Constitution, to see what they think it means:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized.

In our original proceeding in the first step we took, admitting for the sake of argument our jurisdiction and our right, did we use the proper discretion? Was probable cause shown why this particular inquiry should be had and these particular papers be demanded? On the contrary, did not the witness declare his readiness to answer if the committee would say they had any ground for believing that he had in his possession papers which would disclose or that a true answer to the question would disclose a single official personage with whom this House desired to deal? And they did not answer that they had any such ground on which to plant the question. Then does not this House put itself in the attitude of going to a private citizen and demanding that his private papers, his private business, shall be disclosed to them, only because they hope, yet without probable ground for believing, that the answer will disclose something that may lead to something else?

Why, sir, do gentlemen remember that that article of our Constitution was put there by our wise fathers to prevent precisely such a consummation as that? Do they remember that the great Algernon Sidney was visited inquisitorially, that his papers were searched, that his library was seized, and as the result of throwing a drag-net over the whole, when no special allegation of any treasonable thing was made as to his papers, there was discovered a manuscript essay on Liberty, which he had written in the seclusion of his own home, and which being thus fished out by the drag-net of that sort of search and seizure he was put upon his trial, condemned to death and publicly executed as a traitor to his country upon evidence that could never have been disclosed except by unreasonable search and seizure? And it was to prevent such invasions of personal liberties as citizens that our fathers put this clause into the articles of amendment to the Constitution.

Now I must say that the party to which I belong have, in the stormy years of their administration and career here, done many things that I looked upon as of doubtful propriety and of doubtful authority in reference to the rights of private citizens. In the very turbulence of that time I stepped forward to do what I could before the Supreme Court to prevent the punishment by military commission of persons whom I had never seen, and have never yet seen; of people who had committed an offense most offensive in my sight against the country. But I was unwilling they should be punished unlawfully, and I did what I could to prevent such punishment. But I am free to say, looking over all the things that were done in these turbulent years of the past, I have never known the House of Representatives take a position which I regarded as so untenable, and involving so bad a use of discretion, so unwise an assertion of power—if it have the power, which I do not now discuss—as to have insisted under the circumstances upon an answer to the question propounded to this witness.

Mr. GARFIELD. Just one word more. It may be said, and it has been suggested by my friend before me, [Mr. HOAR,] that it is too late to raise that question. Perhaps so; but all the steps we have taken since have been steps made necessary by that first step, and I think that first step was wholly indefensible. I do not see that the wrong can be corrected by either of the resolutions now pending. Of course the House should not deliver up a witness while he is held for examination. But if we were holding him for punishment, I should say we ought to deliver him to the court, or repeal the law. The House ought to reconsider its action ab initio.

Mr. GLOVER. I now yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] and after that gentleman shall have spoken, I shall then call the previous question.

Mr. TUCKER. I had not designed to say a word on this question, which has been very fully and ably discussed, except for the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] I think that the arguments of the gentleman from Indiana, Judge NEW, and the gentleman from Massachusetts and the gentleman from Iowa have been conclusive upon the question of right. By a long series of precedents, running far back in English history, each house of Parliament, not as a court, because neither house of Parliament separately was recognized as omnipotent, but each house of Parliament was regarded as having the right, the self-protective right of committing for contempt; and it was settled that wherever the right was exercised under the legitimate power to punish for contempt, no court could inquire into it further, or interfere with its exercise.

That question and that distinction was very powerfully taken in a comparatively recent case, that of Hansard vs. Stockdale, reported in 36 English Common Law Reports, where the decision of Lord Denman was worthy of all praise and the highest admiration.

Now we have acted here the other day upon a report of a committee of this House. A party refused to testify in answer to a question propounded to him and a vote was taken in this House that he was guilty of a contempt and should be committed to jail; and although the voice of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has been heard here to-day in opposition to that course, the "noes" upon that occasion were so very silent that I did not hear his voice then.

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend from Virginia will allow me to say that there was a very earnest appeal made upon that occasion to postpone the matter until the evidence reported was in print. I did not hear, nor did I ever fully understand the full nature of the case until I saw the papers in print.

Mr. TUCKER. I did not either, but the House on that occasion acted on and passed the resolution, and there was not even a division called for; and I supposed after the discussion that had occurred previous to the taking of the vote that even gentlemen on the other side were satisfied that it was a proper case for the exercise of the power of the House. I think, sir, it is not for a witness under examination before a committee to say whether a particular question is pertinent or not to the inquiry with which the committee is charged.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly not.

Mr. TUCKER. And it would have been hardly proper for the House to interfere with the action of the committee charged with a very grave inquiry; and I can see many grounds on which the particular question was proper. The object of these investigation committees is to inquire into the mode in which this Government is administered in all its departments; and this House is the great inquisitorial power of the nation for the purpose of finding out corruption or malfeasance in office. And in prosecuting that inquiry a question was propounded to this man Kilbourn, and he refused to answer it. He was brought to the bar of the House, and still refused to answer. He was committed for contempt, and no court in the land that has respect for precedents or law would question the right of the House to order the imprisonment of that man for such contempt of its authority. Why, sir, as far back as 1795, in the case of a man named Randall, the very question was proposed which was suggested the other day by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] that under the fifth article of the amendments to the Constitution the party had the right to be tried by a jury. The House of Representatives, in the case of Randall in 1795, imprisoned him for contempt, upon its order and without such trial.

This question came up in the great case of Anderson vs. Dunn—which has settled the question—in the Supreme Court; and it was decided that where this House has committed a man for contempt there is no court that can inquire into the propriety of that adjudication.

Now English courts take this distinction, and I stand upon it, that the House can do nothing which the court has not a right to inquire into as a matter of mere jurisdiction; but, conceding the jurisdiction, the propriety of the mode in which it is exercised is beyond the reach of all courts.

Now, sir, there was a famous case here that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] doubtless remembers. I find that he would not vote on it, and I commend him for not doing so—the case of Patrick Woods, from my own State, who was committed for contempt for knocking down a member of Congress one hundred and twenty miles away from this capital. And what was done with him? Sir, contrary to all English precedents, contrary to the well-established law on that subject, Congress not only denied him the right of trial by jury, but they condemned him in this House to imprisonment for three months, a period extending beyond the session of the House of Representatives.

Now, sir, the ground on which we imprison men here is the ground so well stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR.] It is not punishment, it is coercion; it is constraint put by a court or other authority upon a recusant witness to compel him to do what it is his duty to do. Why, sir, imprisonment for contempt is not punishment. If the House will look to the fifth amendment of the Constitution, they will find that it applies, of course, to every case of criminal prosecution, but that it does not apply to cases of contempt, as has been well settled by practice.

I read the fifth article of the amendments:

ARTICLE V.

No person shall be held to answer for a capital, or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use, without just compensation.

Now what Federal court ever tried a man for contempt by jury? Imprisonment of a recusant witness is mere constraint to compel him to do right; that is, to obey the order of the court.

Now when this man refused to obey our order we committed him for contempt, and the question is what to do with him. The resolution cited by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] as a precedent was a resolution offered by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Stephens] in 1858. If you look at it you will find that that was not so strong a case as the case under consideration, because that case, while it is like the present case in many respects, had this additional element, which is thus stated in Mr. Stephens's resolution:

And whereas the court in which said presentment is pending have determined that said Wolcott cannot be tried on said presentment so long as this House holds him in custody under its rights and privileges: Therefore, Resolved, &c.

The court in that case so said; no court has so said in this case. As I understand it, the marshal of this District has waited upon our Sergeant-at-Arms and demanded possession of our prisoner. I am not very familiar with the practice in the courts of the United States, not so much so as I am with the practice in the courts of my own State. The courts of my own State have been very delicate in interfering with the liberty of the citizen. Yet we try a man for a misdemeanor, not upon personal appearance but upon appearance by attorney. There is no necessity for the presence of the man upon trial for a misdemeanor in my State, and I apprehend not in the courts of the United States. This man is indicted for a misdemeanor, will be tried for a misdemeanor, and, if convicted, will be fined or imprisoned. It is not a capital offense, not a felony.

You may say that the Constitution declares it is his privilege to be present. Very well; let him assert his privilege; let him ask to be present. No court will ever try him in the face of his demand to be present, when he is in the custody of this House. To demand his release from the custody of this House, therefore, is really to do what the gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. HOAR, has suggested, that if he be released from the custody of this House the marshal would take him before the court, and, his offense being bailable, he would be bailed, and then he would most likely go to parts unknown and snap his fingers in the face of this House.

Mr. HILL. If we were to give up this witness to the court, would we not give up our jurisdiction over him? Could we re-assert that jurisdiction at all, whether he was bailed by the court or not?

Mr. TUCKER. I doubt if we could; at any rate, it would be a very dangerous experiment. I apprehend, therefore, the man cannot be very anxious for an immediate trial, and if he is the court will postpone it until we are done with him. As we cannot hold him in custody beyond the close of this session of the House, as I hold to be the law, our constraining power upon his recusancy would be lost if we gave him up to be tried by the court. We can only hold him until the end of the session.

Mr. GARFIELD. Do you mean the end of the session or the end of Congress.

Mr. TUCKER. End of the session; that has been again and again held in England, though it was denied in this House not only by assertion but in practice. God helping us, I hope it will never be denied again in an American Congress. That is the limit of our power, because, as long as the House is in session, there is a contempt of its authority in the party refusing to answer. When the House has ceased to be in session there is no longer any demand for his answer, because if he were to answer there would be no House in session to hear him.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman has finished that part of his argument I would like to ask a question.

Mr. TUCKER. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is this: Holding, as I understand him to do, the full, and I might say omnipotent, power of this House——

Mr. TUCKER. Not that.

Mr. GARFIELD. The omnipotent power of this House in demanding answers to its questions; holding that nothing but the discretion of the House is to determine what questions should be put to the witness and what answers required, I will ask the gentleman where, in his view of the case, is the line behind which the citizen can be protected against the inquisitorial power of this House into his private affairs? That is what I am anxious to know.

Mr. TUCKER. I will come to that in a moment. The gentleman, I suppose, is referring now to that clause of the Constitution to which he referred in his remarks.

Mr. GARFIELD. Yes. What protection has the citizen against this omnipotent power of the House, as assumed by the gentleman?

Mr. TUCKER. I desire the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] to understand that I do not claim omnipotence in this House; I am disclaiming it, although it has been claimed and practiced in former years. I come now to the particular provision of the amendments to the Constitution to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred. That provision of the Constitution was adopted, I believe, in view of the celebrated decision—the gentleman from Ohio may be able to give me the name of the case—of Lord Chief Justice Pratt, afterward Lord Chancellor Camden, in 1764 and 1765, in connection with the famous John Wilkes case. The amendment is:

> The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, &c.

I think there were warrants issued by the Secretary of State for the seizure of certain numbers of one of the famous North Briton papers; and Lord Chief Justice Pratt defended the right of the citizen against those warrants. If the gentleman will look at this clause of the Constitution he will see that it has nothing to do with this present question:

> The right of the people to be secure in their houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated.

We have not sent our Sergeant-at-Arms to search and seize the papers of Kilbourn. We have asked him what he knew.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will my friend allow me? It amounts to the same thing precisely when we demand of Kilbourn that he shall produce to the committee his private papers, we having obtained jurisdiction of his person.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman deny that he has done it at the bar?

Mr. GARFIELD. Done what at the bar?

Mr. TUCKER. In similar cases in court he has as counsel at the bar asked similar questions. Suppose a case in court. He asks the question of the witness: "Mr. Kilbourn, who were partners with you in the real-estate pool?"

Mr. GARFIELD. The very question I am now making inquiry about is, what did the House do at its bar? Why ask this question?

Mr. TUCKER. In the supposed case if the counsel on the other side says that the question is an improper one, and not relevant to the inquiry before the court, the court will decide that question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TUCKER. Very well. The court decides: "It is proper for you, General GARFIELD, to ask that question." You ask: "Mr. Kilbourn, who were your partners in the real-estate pool?" Mr. Kilbourn says, "I do not choose to answer; for that is an unreasonable search into my private and confidential matters."

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend remembers that he was required to produce his books of account and all his papers.

Mr. TUCKER. I will come to that point in a moment. The witness's first point was that the information sought was a secret, a confidential secret, between the honorable members of the "real-estate pool." The court in the case I am supposing decides it is a proper question. Can the witness then defy the court and refuse to answer? The House of Representatives, by so large a majority that the minority did not ask a division, decided in one case that the question asked of the witness was a proper question. Shall he be permitted now to say "It is not a proper question; it is an unreasonable search into my secret matters contained in my papers, and I will not answer?" Clearly not.

Now I go a step further. Suppose Mr. Kilbourn says, "Well, Smith was one of my partners; Brown was another; and there was no other." He is then asked, "Mr. Kilbourn, did you keep a book that related to the real-estate pool?" "Yes." "Then produce it." Has the gentleman from Ohio never asked a merchant to produce his books in order to see whether the merchant was telling the truth or making a statement which the books would belie? Suppose the court say that the production of the book is relevant to the inquiry; is not the witness concluded? And can he refuse to produce the books on the demand of the court?

As argued by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] I say that, right or wrong, this House, for which I claim no judicial powers, has nevertheless power under the Constitution to protect itself against contempts and against the contumacy of a man who refuses to give information which is essential to the duties devolved upon the House. When the question was put to him, and this House decided that he must produce his books—when this House did not even divide upon that question, is it not too late, not only to raise the point, but now to discuss it?

Mr. GARFIELD. My friend has got quite aside from the question we were discussing. I distinctly waived the discussion of the question of the right. Reserving any expression of opinion upon that point, I called attention to the mode in which the House had used its assumed or real discretion. And when I put to my friend the question what protection the citizen has against the improper exercise of that discretion, he says it is too late to discuss that.

Mr. TUCKER. I understood the gentleman to be discussing the question, although he did not propose to raise it. I have no objection to hearing him on any occasion upon any question which he desires to discuss, for he always does it well and ably. But, I say, was it not the proper time for the gentleman to raise his voice or to call the yeas and nays or a division upon the question when it was before the House on the adoption of the proposition that this witness was in contempt and should be imprisoned?

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will allow me to say that I tried very earnestly, as did a good many others here, for the very purpose of getting this discussion up, to have the request allowed that the witness might be heard by his counsel, so that the whole question could be brought up deliberately here. That was refused by an overwhelming vote.

Mr. TUCKER. The distinguished gentleman from Ohio forgets that the counsel of Mr. Kilbourn was present, and that the only question was whether the counsel should make a speech ore tenus or should deliver himself in a well-prepared written argument "cut and dried" before he came. As soon as we decided that he might be heard by written argument, it was produced and read at the bar of the House—the very speech which Judge Black had prepared for the occasion; and I venture to say he preferred the reading of that written argument to being called on to deliver an extemporaneous one.

The witness was heard by counsel. Gentlemen, if they still objected, might have called the yeas and nays; they did not do it. They waived that; so that by a decision of this House, in which there was no real division manifested, the witness has been declared to be in contempt. Now, I ask, is it not too late to raise that question or to discuss it?

Then we come back to the question of discretion. If we discharge this party and he should be given over to the courts, the courts might continue his case from time to time. We, letting him loose, would lose our power to get from him the important testimony we desire; certainly if he was out of our possession until after the session ends. On the other hand, I venture to say that if this House will decide to-day—as I have no doubt it will, from the manifestations I have seen on the other side as well as on this—if this House should decide to-day by a large vote that Mr. Kilbourn cannot play the game of getting out of our hands for any purpose until he answers those questions, my word for it, he will answer them; and my word for this further assertion: there will be no other witness before this Congress who will refuse to answer, because it will be seen that this House has determined that it will not only assert, but will enforce its authority against all persons who are in contempt of its powers. I hope, therefore, that the resolution offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. GLOVER] will be adopted without any division.

Mr. GLOVER. I now call the previous question upon the resolution and substitutes.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The resolution offered by Mr. GLOVER was again read.

The question first recurred on Mr. HURLBUT'S substitute; which was read as follows:

> Whereas on the 14th day of March, 1876, this House, by its resolution, did commit Hallet Kilbourn to the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms of this House in the common jail of the District of Columbia for an infringement of the privileges of the House in refusing satisfactorily to answer certain questions put to him and to produce certain books and papers by order of the House, and is still held in custody under said order; and whereas afterward, in pursuance with the provisions of law, the Speaker of the House did certify to the district attorney of the District of Columbia the facts pertaining to said case, and the same were laid before the grand jury of said District, and a presentment was thereupon found against said Kilbourn for the said offense; and whereas said Kilbourn cannot be tried on said presentment so long as this House holds him in custody under its rights of privilege: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and directed to cause said Kilbourn to be released from jail, and to deliver him over to the marshal of said District of Columbia, or other person authorized to receive him, to answer to the presentment pending in said court.

Mr. GLOVER. I demand the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 33, nays 190, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, Blair, Bradley, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, Cason, Denison, Dunnell, Eames, Farwell, Hale, Hathorn, Hoge, Hubbell, Hurlbut, Hyman, Kasson, Lapham, Leavenworth, Lynch, Magoon, Morey, Nash, Page, Platt, Sinnickson, Smalls, Martin I. Walker, John W. Wallace, Ward, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—66.

So Mr. HURLBUT's amendment was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. LUTTRELL stated that his colleague, Mr. WIGGINTON, who was detained at his home by sickness, would, if present, vote in the negative.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question now recurs on the adoption of the resolution reported by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. GLOVER.]

The resolution was adopted.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask by unanimous consent, owing to the extreme inclemency of the weather, the session ordered for this evening by the order made yesterday be dispensed with and a session be ordered for Friday evening next.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object.

PRINTING OF OBITUARY ADDRESSES.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour now begins at three minutes before four o'clock.

Mr. RANDALL. I understand there is a special order which supersedes the morning hour, but as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] gives way to the special order for this evening——

Mr. SINGLETON. I rise to a privileged question, and submit a report from the Committee on Printing.

I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back a bill (H. R. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting before the name of Henry Wilson, the following words: 'Andrew Johnson and the portrait of."

Mr. REAGAN. I insist on the special order.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Printing under the rules are expressly authorized to report at any time, and this is therefore a privileged report, and having the right to report the House has the right to consider.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask the bill be read as it will be when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the House of Representatives, &c., That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Orris S. Ferry, late United States Senator from Connecticut, be printed, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed a portrait of Mr. Ferry to accompany the same; and the amount necessary for the engraving and printing of the portrait of Andrew Johnson, and also the portrait of Henry Wilson, heretofore ordered, be, and the same is, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN and Mr. ATKINS rose.

Mr. ATKINS. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to present the report of a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee states that he rises to a privileged question; but inasmuch as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] addressed the Chair first, the Chair desires to know whether the gentleman from Texas also rises to a privileged question?

Mr. REAGAN. I rise to call up the special order fixed for to-day, being the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2799) reported from the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not yield for that.

The SPEAKER. As against the special order for to-day the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] is entitled to the floor.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION FOR CERTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. ATKINS. I present the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 2589.)

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the Senate and agree to the same.

JNO. D. C. ATKINS,
ROBT. HAMILTON,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

R. E. WITHERS,
W. B. ALLISON,
R. J. OGLESBY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. ATKINS. I move the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

COMMITTEE ON TEXAS BORDER TROUBLES.

Mr. BALLOU. I rise to make a privileged report. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the resolution which I send to the desk, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles shall be authorized to have a map of the Lower Rio Grande engraved and printed to accompany their report and evidence.

The amendment of the Committee on Printing was to strike out the word "engraved" and to insert instead thereof the word "photo-lithographed."

Mr. BALLOU. The saving of expense by the adoption of this amendment will be about $55.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. For the comfort of members to-night I again make the proposition that this evening's session be dispensed with, and that we fix an evening session for Friday in lieu of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, that the evening session of to-night be dispensed with, and that there be an evening session on Friday under the same order?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the order was changed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up the special order for to-day, being the bill (H. R. No. 2799) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry, which is, whether the order which the gentleman from Texas calls up takes precedence of the morning hour? The bill called up by the gentleman from Texas was made a special order for to-day after the morning hour.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman not to take me off the floor. This was made a special order for to-day, not from day to day till disposed of. It is a very important bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair finds by looking at the order made by the House that this bill was made a special order for this day after the morning hour; and there has not yet been a morning hour.

Mr. DURHAM. I insist on there being a morning hour. I call for the regular order.

Mr. REAGAN. I will say to the gentleman from Kentucky that this bill is one of very great importance. The consideration of it was assigned to this day, and the committee have been pressed from every portion of the country to urge its passage; and the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, which is the committee now on call, has consented to waive his right to the morning hour that we may have this one day for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. DURHAM. I am here representing bills to be reported by other committees, and I insist on having the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas has the right to take the sense of the House whether it will proceed now to the consideration of his bill without having a morning hour. Does he make that motion?

Mr. REAGAN. I do.

The question being taken on Mr. REAGAN's motion it was agreed to—ayes 111, noes not counted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes.

REGULATION OF STEAM-VESSELS.

The SPEAKER. The House having agreed to take up the special order, it now proceeds to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2799) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill has occupied a great deal of the time of the Committee on Commerce. It is a bill of very considerable importance, affecting as it does the entire shipping interests and commerce of the United States. There was a bill of the same kind, or at least embracing in the main the same features, which was passed by the House at the last session, but from some cause failed of passage in the Senate. The passage of this bill is urged by considerations of very great moment, and gentlemen from various portions of the Union have attended the sessions of the committee and urged the importance of prompt action upon this bill.

Some time ago the committee reported a bill to the House which was ordered to be printed and recommitted. After it was recommitted other amendments were suggested to the bill, and a substitute embracing these amendments was reported by the committee and assigned for consideration to-day.

I have no speech to make upon this subject except a practical explanation of the changes made by the bill upon the existing law. Its importance will be sufficiently realized by what I have already said and the reference I have made to the urgency of the pressure from all parts of the country for its passage; and in order to facilitate early action upon the bill, I shall limit what I have to say to an explanation of the amendments offered to it. And I propose, unless other gentlemen desire to discuss the bill, after I have made this explanation to ask the House to consider it, if they desire to do so, section by section, under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole, and to pass the bill, if there is no serious objection to it, this evening. I ask this because, the bill having been set for to-day, if it loses its place it will be found difficult to get it up at a future day, while the interests and necessities of the commerce of the country demand and require early action upon it.

The first amendment is to the first section of the bill.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman from Texas allow me a moment? There is so much confusion in this Hall that I was unable to hear exactly what the gentleman proposes, but I will ask him this question: Does he believe that there is any possibility to pass this long bill, which treats upon very important subjects, at any time to-day?

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer the gentleman by saying that, if there is objection to the prompt passage of the bill, I shall accommodate my action to that objection, but if gentlemen will take the bill as reported and a copy of the Statutes at Large, I can show exactly what changes are proposed in the law, and I hope when I show that clearly to obviate the objections that may be made to the bill; and, if there should be no objection to the provisions of the bill, I hope that it may pass this evening. If it requires discussion, important as I realize that it is, I shall not attempt to force the passage of the bill without such consideration as its importance requires.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman will remember that a bill similar to this was before a former Congress for days and days, considered section by section, and finally elaborated and passed after a great deal of labor in the House. Now it has struck me that it would be impossible to go over the many amendments which are proposed here, and give them anything like the consideration to which their importance entitles them, in the brief time we shall have in the remnant of this waning session.

Mr. REAGAN. I am obliged to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for the suggestion, because it enables me to repeat that if gentlemen will take the Revised Statutes and have before them this bill they will find no difficulty in its consideration. The bill to which the gentleman has referred, in the last Congress, was a code and not a proposition to amend particular sections of the laws regulating commerce and navigation. This is a bill which proposes to amend particular sections so that gentlemen will not be required to look over the whole of the law on this subject to ascertain what the amendments are. This bill, as I said before, proposes merely to amend particular sections of the law, and it will be seen as we go along exactly how each section will be changed. The difficulty, perhaps, which attended the passage of the law of last session in the Senate was from the fact that it was a code and did not pretend to amend particular sections of the law. Gentlemen who desire to be informed upon the subject can see how this bill affects the existing law.

I think I can show promptly in a brief explanation how every section of the existing law is affected by this bill, and if the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and others will have before them the Revised Statutes and the bill as I make my explanation, they will see that in a brief time they can overcome the serious difficulty that impeded the passage of the bill last session.

Mr. HALE. I have no wish to interrupt the gentleman, but when I look at this bill, which is one of twenty-six pages, with many amendments, I am satisfied that it is impossible that it should be got through to-night. What I had on my mind was, that we could get a more intelligent consideration of the bill if some future day were fixed when it could be taken up, and not in the remnant of a day as we are doing now, so that the gentleman will get the benefit of the scrutiny which members may give to the bill and which cannot be given now. I cannot now, even with a copy of the Revised Statutes before me, understand what might be the effect of the amendments pending upon the interests of my constituents, if I have got to give attention to the whole bill, twenty-six pages in length, in an hour or two.

Mr. REAGAN. If I am allowed to proceed with my explanation this evening, and if it should prove not satisfactory to members, I will agree to such a course as may be deemed advisable; but if I let the bill lose its place now, I am unable to say when it can be considered again, and I ask therefore that I may now be permitted to go on with the explanations I have to make.

Mr. HALE. I will not interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. REAGAN. The first amendment to section 1 of the bill, in lines 6 and 7, section 4233 of the Revised Statutes, extends the rules for preventing collisions of vessels to all foreign as well as domestic vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States. A similar jurisdiction is exercised by foreign governments over our vessels when in their waters.

The second amendment to section 1 of the bill, lines 10 and 11, extends the rule prescribed by the original section to steam-vessels rigged for carrying sail as well as to those actually carrying sail. The words "or rigged for carrying sail" are inserted for the purpose of putting beyond question the fact that any vessel fitted for carrying sail shall, whether under sail or not, carry the lights therein prescribed.

The third amendment to this section, in lines 11 and 12, requires that the fog-horn of sail-vessels under way shall be sounded in foggy or thick weather every two instead of every five minutes; and that steam-vessels and sail-vessels when not under way shall in foggy or thick weather sound a bell at intervals of not more than two instead of five minutes, for greater security against collisions.

Mr. HALE. The amendment the gentleman has just alluded to is a very important one, especially in connection with our coast-wise navigation. Let me ask the gentleman what bill is under consideration?

Mr. REAGAN. It is House bill No. 2799, a substitute for House bill No. 1190.

Mr. HALE. What is the printer's number of the bill?

Mr. REAGAN. It is printer's No. 2964.

Mr. HALE. And will the gentleman tell me in which line of this bill—for I have not his memoranda as to the order of the amendments—is the amendment in relation to fog-horns?

Mr. REAGAN. It is found in lines 11 and 12. I propose to call attention in every case of amendment to the line and section. The amendment in relation to fog-horns is in lines 11 and 12 of the first section.

The fourth amendment to this first section, lines 17 to 27 of the bill, simply omits the word "way" wherever it occurs in the rule as it is now in the law, and substitutes for it the word "course." There is no other change in this rule.

The fifth, sixth, and seventh amendments to this section, rules 19, 20, and 22, lines 28 to 36, simply strike out the word "way" wherever it occurs in the law and inserts in its stead the word "course;" no other change is made. It was insisted before the Committee on Commerce by the supervising inspector-general, General Burnett, and by a number of the members of the board of supervising inspectors of steam-vessels, and by Captain Whiting of Detroit, and Mr. Copeland of New York, both members of the "National Board of Steam-Navigation," and by others, that in view of the decisions of the courts (United States courts at Chicago and New York) on the legal meaning of the word "way" in this statute, it was of very great importance that it should be changed to "course," to prevent cases of gross injustice. In the decisions referred to it is stated that the courts hold that the word "way" does not mean "course," and that this places the vessel required to keep out of the "way" of another at the mercy of the other.

The eighth amendment to this section, lines 37 to 43 of the bill, changes this rule so that it shall agree with the changes proposed in rules 17, 19, 20, and 22, and the abrogation of rule 24.

The ninth amendment to this section, lines 44 and 45 of the bill, strikes out rule 24, as not necessary to be retained when the preceding rules shall be changed as proposed.

The tenth amendment, which is of section 4234 of the Revised Statutes, section 2 of the bill, makes two additions to the provisions of the existing law: First, the words "and all damages caused thereby," in lines 12 and 13, are inserted, which makes the vessel liable for the damage done by her neglect to show proper lights as well as for the penalty of $200; and, second, all of the proposed section from the word "offense," in line 15, is added to the existing law, making the officer or officers in charge of the deck of such vessel, as well as the vessel, responsible for a failure or refusal to exhibit the necessary lights, and punishable by a fine of $100 and imprisonment for not exceeding one year. This is necessary for the security of the vessel-owners as well as for that of the public.

The eleventh amendment, which is of section 4236 of the Revised Statutes, section 3 of the bill, is to add to the section all after the word "port," in line 9. The added words are deemed necessary for the purpose of avoiding an apparent conflict with sections 4401 and 4404 of the Revised Statutes.

The twelfth amendment, which is of section 4288 of the Revised Statutes, section 4 of the bill, omits the following words of this section of the Revised Statutes, to wit: "but this section shall not apply to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation." By striking out these words we extend the same means of protection and security in this respect to vessels navigating the rivers and inland waters that we do to those navigating the high seas.

The thirteenth amendment, which is of section 4289 of the Revised Statutes, section 5 of the bill, strikes out of the latter part of the section as it now is the following words, to wit: "Or to any vessel of any description whatsoever used in rivers or inland navigation." The effect of striking these words out of the section is to make the liability of vessels navigating the rivers and inland waters of the United States the same as of vessels navigating the ocean, but excepting canal-boats, barges, and lighters from this rule.

The fourteenth amendment, which is to section 4400 of the Revised Statutes, section 6 of the bill, strikes out of the section as it now stands the words "which are common highways of commerce or open to general or competitive navigation," and so changes the latter part of the section as to subject steam-vessels of other countries, other than public vessels, to the provisions of this title (52 of the Revised Statutes) so far as relates to equipment, outfits, and navigating, and the transportation of dangerous articles as freight or stores. And the words "and boats propelled in whole or in part by steam for navigating canals," as they are in the law, are stricken out by this amendment.

The dangers attending the navigation of steam canal-boats are as great to passengers as in other classes of steam-vessels. Steamers built for navigating canals almost without exception navigate other and open waters which are navigated by other classes of steamers, and therefore they should be subject to the same inspection and regulations when in the public waters of the United States.

The second amendment of this section is intended to make it clear that all vessels except the public vessels of the United States and of other countries are subject to the provision of that title of the law. This amendment relieves the section of obscurity.

The third amendment to this section subjects the steam-vessels of other countries, excepting their public vessels, to the same provisions to which our own vessels are subject so far as relates to equipments, outfits, and navigating. And in this we follow the English law.

The fifteenth amendment, which is to section 4405 of the Revised Statutes, page 5, section 7 of the bill, changes the time of the meeting of the board of supervising inspectors and the supervising inspector-general from the third Wednesday in January to the third Wednesday in September of each year; and the place of their meeting instead of being designated at Washington City, in the District of Columbia, to such place as the Secretary of the Treasury shall designate.

This change is recommended by the supervising-inspector-general, and by the Secretary of the Treasury. This change is recommended to secure the advantage of having the report of their operations for the year ready with the reports in relation to the other branches of the public service at the meeting of each session of Congress, and because the meeting on the third Monday in September is after the principal business of the year has been accomplished, and the meeting of the board at that time would cause the least interference with the ordinary duties of the inspectors; and because it is believed the meeting of the board at different places, as under the act of August 30, 1852, would afford its members better opportunities of becoming acquainted with every kind of steam-vessel and navigation; the western inspectors to become well-informed as to the requirements of the ocean and lake service, and the seaboard and lake inspectors to become better acquainted with the arrangemant of western steamers and the necessities of our river navigation.

The sixteenth amendment, which is to section 4413 of the Revised Statutes, section 8, page 6 of the bill, adds to the penalties which may be imposed on any master, mate, engineer, or pilot of any steam-vessel who neglects or willfully refuses to observe the regulations prescribed by the preceding section a suspension or revocation of his license, and imprisonment not exceeding two years.

Mr. CONGER. I notice in the bill a provision in regard to damages, to which the gentleman has not referred. Is that struck out?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; that is in the bill as it stands. I have simply omitted to refer to it in my explanation. In giving these brief reasons for the changes I have not embraced every reason; nor have I, as in the instance suggested by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] called attention in all cases to the changes; but I have aimed to embrace all the material alterations.

The seventeenth amendment, which is to section 4418 of the Revised Statutes, pages 6 to 9, section 9 of the bill, first changes so much of the existing law as requires the use of automatic steam-registering gauges to be used on steam-vessels. The board of inspectors, inspector-general, and others well informed on the subject insist that these automatic steam-registering gauges are unreliable and even dangerous; second, the words "and a suitable steam-whistle" are inserted, so as to authorize the inspectors to determine the character and dimensions of steam-whistles to be used in foggy weather.

The third change made by this section is intended to enable the inspectors to determine in what cases fusible metals shall be inserted so as to fuse by the heat of the furnace. The committee was advised that in some cases the use of fusible metals is conducive to safety and that in others it is not, and that it is best to leave their use to the discretion of the inspectors.

Mr. CONGER. I see there is also a change leaving out the requirement to have the safety-valves locked up.

Mr. REAGAN. That is entirely abolished. The lock-up safety-valves are excluded from the law by these amendments, as will appear as we go on.

The fourth change made by this section is in relation to the means to be used to blow the mud out of the boilers of steam-vessels. As the law is it is required that the mud shall be thoroughly blown out of the boilers; the amendment proposed to this (line 39) is to add the words "so far as practicable" thoroughly to remove the mud and sediment. The committee was advised that it is impossible to remove the mud and sediment "thoroughly" from the boilers while in use, and we have submitted this change so that our law in this respect may not require an impossibility.

The eighteenth amendment is to repeal section 4419 of the Revised Statutes, being section 8, page 9, of the bill. This section relates entirely to lock-up safety-valves and registering-gauges, both of which instruments the committee are informed are entirely worthless.

The nineteenth amendment, which is of section 4421 of the Revised Statutes, section 11, pages 9 and 10, amends by adding all after line 16. In relation to the construction, equipment, and outfit of steam-vessels, the provisions of the law are full and positive in their requirements as to inspection and the duties of inspectors. And under sections 4425 and 5482 of the Revised Statutes severe penalties are imposed upon inspectors for neglect of duty or misconduct in office. And as there may be cases in which the inspectors' certificates may be the only evidence of compliance with the law which the owners of vessels could produce, the committee see no good reason why this certificate should not be made prima facie evidence of a compliance by the owners with the provisions of the law respecting the inspection of steam-vessels. The effect of this certificate as an instrument of evidence could be controlled by proof of neglect of duty, willful misconduct, or fraud, which might in most cases be made. And this amendment would obviate any question about the authentication of such certificates, so as to secure their admissibility in evidence where they may not be attacked for fraud.

The twentieth amendment, which is of section 4427 of the Revised Statutes, section 12, page 10 of the bill, omits the words "alarm indicators," and provides for low-water "gauges" in their stead, and also provides for "steam-whistles" for the classes of vessels to which the section relates. The "alarm indicators" are represented by reliable experts as quite unreliable, as tending to inspire false confidence, leading to neglect on the part of engineers, and thus bringing about the very dangers they are intended to avert.

The twenty-first amendment, which is of section 4429 of the Revised Statutes, being section 13, page 11 of the bill, strikes out of the section as it stands the words "or who drifts any rivet-hole to make it come fair," and inserts in their stead the words "or shall forcibly drift any rivet-hole which has been drilled or punched unfair, for the purpose of admitting the insertion of rivets."

The "drift-pin" or punch is a necessary instrument in putting together boiler-work, and its proper use involves no injury to the boiler. The defect of the present law is that it does not discriminate between a proper and improper use of the drift-pin, both being alike made subject to the penalty of the law. This amendment does discriminate, and, while it allows the necessary and proper use of this instrument, it makes the improper use of it subject to penalty.

The twenty-second amendment, which is of section 4430 of the Revised Statutes, being section 14, pages 11 and 12 of the bill, omits the words "every iron or steel plate used," and inserts in lieu of them the words "iron or steel made use."

The section as it now stands cannot be carried into effect without destroying every iron or steel plate intended for use in boilers, as every such plate under it is to be subject to the test, which must result in its destruction. The section as here presented makes the proper inspection possible without destroying the boiler-plates inspected.

The twenty-third amendment, which is to section 4431 of the Revised Statutes, being section 15, page 12 of the bill, is made by inserting in the section the words "at the place of manufacture" in lines 7 and 8 of the bill, and by striking out the word "will" and inserting in its stead the words "guaranteed by the manufacturer to" in line 11 of the section.

We are informed that instances have occurred where plates have been stamped after being put on the market and in the hands of the merchants or consumers. When so stamped it can hardly be known with any certainty that the plates are what the stamp represents. To permit the stamping to be done at any other place than that of the manufacture gives facilities for fraud which would not otherwise exist, as an agent of the merchant may stamp plates in a manner which would not be approved by the manufacturer, and thus defraud the consumer and destroy the reputation of the manufacturer.

The second change proposed provides that instead of the plates being stamped with the tensile strains they will bear, which can only be determined by actual trial, they shall be stamped with the tensile strain which the manufacturer will guarantee they will bear. By actual test they may stand a much greater strain than guaranteed. And this guarantee may afford a remedy to persons injured by a false guarantee which could be afforded in no other way, and its effect will be to encourage the making of better boiler-plate and guard the public against accidents and dangers arising from defective boiler-plates.

The twenty-fourth amendment, which is to section 4433 of the Revised Statutes, being section 16, pages 12 and 13, of the bill, is the omission of the words "instead of" and the insertion in lieu of them of the word "or," in line 11. This amendment does away with the discrimination against rivet-holes, which are punched as in section 4429, and allows boilers with double-riveted seams to carry the additional 20 per cent. of pressure over what may be carried on boilers with single-riveted seams, whether the rivet-holes have been drilled or punched. In this the committee followed the advice of reliable experts.

The twenty-fifth amendment, which is to section 4434 of the Revised Statutes, being section 17, pages 13 and 14 of the bill, provides for the change of the plates for boilers from thirty one-hundredths of an inch in thickness to five-sixteenths of an inch in thickness, with a proviso that boilers on steam-vessels for the navigation of rivers flowing into the Gulf of Mexico shall be constructed of plates twenty-six one-hundredths of an inch in thickness. These changes are intended to give increased thickness to boilers, which we are advised is justified by experience.

The twenty-sixth amendment, which is to section 4436 of the Revised Statutes, being section 18, page 14, provides for the use of low-water gauges and omits the provision in the present law for low-water indicators that will give alarm when the water falls below its prescribed limits. The necessity of these changes was stated in considering the amendments to sections 4418 and 4427 of the Revised Statutes, sections 9 and 12 of the bill.

The twenty-seventh amendment, which is to section 4449 of the Revised Statutes, being section 19, pages 14 and 15 of the bill, is a substitute for the entire original section. The amendment limits the operation of the section to "any licensed officer engaged to serve on board any steam-vessel," instead of extending it to "any licensed officer," as in the law as it now stands. The substitute section is also more stringent and explicit, and is intended to protect vessels from the desertion of licensed officers when the vessel is just ready to leave port, and to prevent embarrassment to commerce and to the interests of owners of vessels and passengers from this practice; and it will also protect vessel-owners against any effort by such officers to compel the payment to them of unreasonable wages, or suffer delay and loss with their vessels. It is also intended to raise the standard of licensed officers, and save life and property from the serious and fatal results of intemperance on the part of officers. That relates to the last part of the section.

The twenty-eighth amendment, which is to section 4458 of the Revised Statutes, being section 20, pages 15 and 16 of the bill, reduces the license fees to be paid by each master, chief engineer, and first-class pilot, from ten to eight dollars, and the fees to be paid by every chief mate, engineer, or pilot of an inferior grade from five to four dollars—a reduction of 20 per cent. from the fees now paid by each class.

The system of the inspection of steam-vessels is not kept up at the expense of the general Treasury, but is paid for out of the receipts from the inspection of such vessels and the fees for the licenses of their officers. And it is found that the system can be sustained after making the proposed reduction of 20 per cent. from the fees required of the officers.

The receipts from these sources last year were $260,944.75. The expenditure for the payment of salaries of inspectors and clerks and traveling and incidental expenses was $212,392.02; leaving a surplus for the year of $48,552.73. I state this to show that the reduction of fees is justified.

The twenty-ninth amendment, which is of section 4463 of the Revised Statutes, being section 21, pages 16 and 17 of the bill, is to strike the word "full" out of the third line of the section as it now stands, and to insert a comma after the word "crew" in the third line of the section in the bill.

These amendments restore the law as it was under the act of 1871, secure every desirable interest, and avoid what may sometimes be an unnecessary burden and expense on vessel-owners.

The thirtieth amendment, which is to section 4472 of the Revised Statutes, being section 22, pages 17 to 19 of the bill, is a substitute for the section as it stands in the Revised Statutes.

This amendment is intended to prevent the shipment on any passenger-steamer, under any circumstances, of articles highly dangerous, which, under the section as it now is, may be carried on routes where there is no other practical mode of conveyance.

Provision is made by this amendment for the shipment of cotton in good merchantable shipping order, as technical compliance with the present law would rule out three-fourths of the cotton shipped. The hole made by a cotton-hook, in handling a bale, would prevent it from being carried on a passenger-steamer.

The word "dangerous" is introduced before the words "chemicals and chemical acids," because many chemicals and chemical acids are perfectly safe.

Ferry-boats are excepted from the operation of this section, as in the very nature of their business it is impossible for those in charge of them to examine each wagon, cart, or dray that may be driven on board, and hay is almost always loose on wagons which carry it.

An additional restriction is also imposed on the shipment of refined petroleum. When put up in good hermetically-sealed metallic cases, securely packed in boxes or casks, at a temperature which will not ignite at less than 110° Fahrenheit, it may be shipped on any passenger steamer, subject to the regulations provided in the bill. And it may be shipped in iron-bound barrels, subject to the same regulations, when it will not ignite at a lower temperature than 150° Fahrenheit. The reason for making this difference between refined petroleum shipped in cases and in barrels is that the barrels are liable to give off gases which may ignite and produce disasters, which are not likely to arise from that which is put up in hermetically-sealed cases packed in boxes or casks.

The thirty-first amendment, which is of section 4475 of the Revised Statutes, being section 23, page 19 of the bill, introduces the word "dangerous" before chemical in the third line of the section and adds the words "when shipped or offered for shipment or" in the eighth line of the section; and is also amended by adding the last paragraph of the section, lines 14 to 20; thus limiting the restrictions to "dangerous" chemical acids, and prescribing the condition in which the articles named shall be when shipped or offered for shipment.

The thirty-second amendment, which is of section 4476 of the Revised Statutes, being section 24, page 20 of the bill, amends the section by adding the word "dangerous" before the words chemical acids in line 7 of the section and by inserting the words "and giving at the time of shipment or delivery to the vessel written notice to the master, clerk, agent, or owner of such vessel, of the true character thereof," in lines 12 to 15 of the bill; and by striking out of the section, as the law now is, the words "eighteen months," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "three years" as the time for the imprisonment of offenders.

This section, as amended, is intended to prevent the shipment of these dangerous articles under false names or without notice of the true contents of the packages which contain them, and increases the penalty for the violation of its provisions.

The thirty-third amendment, section 25, page 20 of the bill, repeals section 4484 of the Revised Statutes.

The thirty-fourth amendment, which is to section 4485 of the Revised Statutes, being section 26, pages 20 and 21 of the bill, repeals the section as it now stands, and substitutes for sections 4484 and 4485 of the Revised Statutes the section in the bill.

Under these two sections of the law, as it now stands, no lake or sea-going steamer can be navigated, as it is necessary under them to so stow the cargo on deck that it cannot shift in rough weather, and with passage-ways open on deck fore and aft this could not be done.

This section of the bill requires permanent stairways and other sufficient means convenient to passengers for their escape to the upper deck on such vessels in case of the vessel sinking or other accident endangering life, and leaves it possible for the freight on the decks of lake or sea-going vessels to be securely stowed; and on any deck of such vessels where passengers are carried provision is made for an ample fore and aft passage-way.

On steam-vessels navigating the rivers and inland waters, being exempt from the disturbance caused by the waters of the sea or great lakes, an ample fore and aft passage-way and an athwart-ship passage-way from side to side of the vessel is required.

This section has for its object to provide for the greatest practical convenience and safety to passengers with the least practical interference with the freight of vessels.

The thirty-fifth amendment, which is to section 4487 of the Revised Statutes, being section 27, pages 21 and 22, is to strike out of the second line of the section as it now stands the word "or" and substitute for it the word "on," so that it shall read "the pilot on watch" instead of "the pilot or watch." This was doubtless a typographical error in the law, which, if left so, would confer very great powers and responsibilities on the watchmen of vessels, when neither their positions nor duties make it proper for them to be charged with such duties or responsibilities. These should be devolved on the officers, not on the crews.

The thirty-sixth amendment, which is to section 4488 of the Revised Statutes, being section 28, pages 22 and 23 of the bill, strikes out so much of the section, as it now stands, as requires sea-going vessels and vessels navigating the northern lakes to have boat-disengaging apparatus, and substitutes for the words stricken out the words "tackle for hoisting, lowering, and detaching the boats."

This alteration is proposed for the reason that the disengaging apparatus to be operated by one person disengaging both ends of the boat simultaneously from the tackles, by which it may be lowered into the water, is dangerous in use; and the supervising board have discontinued its use and revoked all approvals of what is known as disengaging apparatus.

The thirty-seventh amendment, which is to section 4490 of the Revised Statutes, being section 29, pages 23 and 24 of the bill, is a substitution of the section in the bill for the existing section. The present law provides for three water-tight bulkheads on all sea-going and lake steamers, which are to reach to the main deck in single-decked vessels and to the deck next below the main deck in other vessels. This in many cases renders the bulkhead useless for the purpose intended, as the lower deck of many sea-going vessels is below the load-water line; and in case of filling the water would at once rise above the top of their bulkheads and thus flow to all parts of the vessel. This amendment provides for extending the bulkheads up to the deck next above the load-water line, that they may be effective in securing the objects of their use.

This section also provides for openings of communication through the bulk-heads, with attachments for closing such openings water-tight, in accordance with the recent improvements in ship-building.

The section, in so far as it relates to the bulk-heads, is to take effect two months after the passage of the law. Under the law as it is now it is to take effect as to all vessels completed six months after the passage of the law, without reference to the time of the commencement of building the vessel.

The thirty-eighth amendment, which is to section 4491 of the Revised Statutes, being section 30, page 24 of the bill, changes and adds to the section. As the law now stands it denies to owners of steamers the privilege of using any appliance for the better security of life, no matter how meritorious it may be, until it shall have been approved by the supervising board. The amendment, while it does not relieve owners from the use of any appliance approved by the board, permits the use of additional appliances that, in the judgment of the owners, may be useful. Provision is also made in this amendment for the addition of other approved appliances, after they shall have been sufficiently tested, without subjecting owners to the risk and danger of using untested appliances which might cause serious disaster.

The thirty-ninth amendment, which is to section 4493 of the Revised Statutes, being section 31, pages 24 to 26 of the bill, provides the measure of liability of the owners and officers of vessels used to navigate the rivers, the great northern lakes, and other inland waters of the United States. As the law is now, the owners of vessels navigating the inland waters of the United States are liable for the safety of freights, &c., as common carriers; that is, every owner or part owner of such a vessel is liable for all damages which occur on the vessel. This has the effect either to deter persons from investing their capital in vessels intended for our inland navigation, or, if they do so, it causes them to resort to feigned sales and mortgages in very many instances to save themselves from this large liability. By either course the interests of our extensive inland commerce are injuriously affected. Cheap transportation, so much needed and so urgently demanded in all parts of the country, demands a policy which shall induce the fair, free investment of capital in the means of transportation, and secure the vessel-owners against the unlimited liability of common carriers.

The committee have aimed by this amended section to fix and define the liability of the officers, employés, and owners of such vessels, so as to give every needed security to passengers and freights by prescribing severe penalties and full liability against all officers, employés, and owners by whose fault or willful neglect injury may be done to the person or property of another; and at the same time they propose to limit the liability of vessel-owners, when they are guilty of no fault or willful neglect of duty, to the value of their interest in the vessel and the pending freights. This, with the additional security often obtained by insurance, especially on freights, will protect the interests of shippers, while it will encourage the investment of capital in vessels, promote cheap transportation, and increase, it is believed, the security of shippers.

This section also makes the rule as to such damages substantially the same on the inland waters as on the ocean and great northern lakes.

I have, Mr. Speaker, perhaps at the expense of the patience of the House, felt it to be necessary to go thus much into a detailed explanation of this bill, calling attention, as fully as I could in this space of time, to the changes made by it in the existing law and assigning some reasons for those changes. To have gone into the assignment of all the reasons which might suggest themselves for many of these changes would have very much prolonged the discussion and perhaps would not have benefited the House.

Having thus gone through with these proposed changes, I desire again to state that many interests, from all portions of the country I may say, have urged upon the committee the importance of early action upon this bill. Those who were members of the last House will remember that at the last session a bill, having in view the same general object, was then before the House and its passage was urged. It did pass the House, but, as I before suggested, from some cause it failed to pass the Senate.

If it is desired to prolong the discussion upon this bill, as from its importance and the magnitude of the interests involved I presume it may be, I will now ask the consent of the House that its further consideration be set down for some early day in the future, some day that will meet the convenience and wishes of the House. To that end, I will suggest that it be set down for Saturday next after the reading of the Journal, and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Excepting appropriation bills.

Mr. SAYLER. As the appropriation bill has been specially provided for by the evening sessions ordered by the House, I would suggest that there probably will be no antagonism between it and this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not want to force the appropriation bill as against this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN.) Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN?]

Mr. HALE. I would suggest that some day in the middle of next week be indicated, by which time we probably would be able to get the appropriation bill out of the way.

Mr. RANDALL. Say Saturday of next week.

Mr. REAGAN. I would rather have it set for next Saturday. By that time members who feel an interest in the bill will have examined it and prepared such amendments as they may wish to offer. I will propose at that time that the bill be taken up and considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, section by section, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HALE. Let that be a part of the arrangement now.

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to suggest to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] that it is exceedingly difficult to get a quorum here on a Saturday, and the bill may fail from the mere lack of the necessary number to pass it. I do not like Saturday on that account, as I am very much interested in this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] introduced the original bill upon this subject at this session, I would be very much inclined to defer to his wishes upon the subject of a day for the consideration of this bill, keeping in view always the very earnest desire to have it acted on as early as possible. I think, however, we can have a quorum here on Saturday. I will therefore ask that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Saturday next, immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that it then be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, section by section, under the five-minute rule.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. YOUNG. I have an amendment which I desire to offer to the pending bill, to amend section 4472 of the Revised Statutes by striking out the word "cotton" wherever it occurs in that section.

Mr. HALE. Under the proposed arrangement there will be unlimited opportunity for amendment.

Mr. YOUNG. I ask to have printed for the information of the House, in connection with my amendment, a memorial from the Cotton Exchange of the city of Memphis.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the Chair state what is the proposition, so that it may be understood by the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is that the further consideration of this bill be postponed until Saturday next immediately after the reading of the Journal, and that it then be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole, section by section, under the five-minute rule.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

SALE OF PAWNEE RESERVATION.

Mr. BOONE. By an order of the House the bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation was made a special order for to-day in Committee of the Whole. Of course at this late hour it is not practicable to proceed with its consideration to-day, and I therefore ask that it be made a special order for Tuesday of next week immediately after the morning hour and from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL. Not from day to day.

Mr. BOONE. Yes.

Mr. RANDALL. Its consideration may take the whole of the week.

Mr. BOONE. No, it will not.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to having it made the special order for that day only.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] will not name so early a day. Say Tuesday of week after next.

Mr. BOONE. This bill is a very important one. There are interests in it that cannot be postponed in justice to the country and to the Indians whom it will affect. I have been trying for several days to get it considered; and I cannot consent to postpone it beyond the time I have named. I insist that it be made the special order for next Tuesday at two o'clock.

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to interfere with reports of the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is that the understanding of the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. BOONE. It cannot affect those bills anyhow, I suppose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion will then be modified by adding "not to interfere with the consideration of general appropriation bills."

The motion, as modified, was agreed to.

POST-ROADS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads. The committee recommend concurrence in the amendments of the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inquire whether there is any general legislation in this bill or simply the usual post-routes?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. It is the general post-route bill.

Mr. CONGER. Have the propositions for post-roads which have been presented since the time when this bill went to the Senate been inserted in the bill?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. They have not.

There being no objection, the amendments of the Senate were taken up and concurred in.

EXHIBITION OF MORAN'S PAINTINGS AT THE CENTENNIAL.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to send two paintings by Thomas Moran to be exhibited at the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia be taken from the Speaker's table and put on its passage. I hope I may be allowed one word of explanation. These painting are now hung in the Senate wing of the Capitol. Mr. Moran is desirous of exhibiting them at the centennial; and it is a matter of importance to him that authority for this purpose should be given as early as possible. The condition upon which it is proposed to allow these paintings to be removed is that Mr. Moran shall insure them fully, that the Government shall incur no expense by their removal, and that he shall be responsible for their safe return between now and the 1st of December next. I ask unanimous consent that the joint resolution be taken from the Speaker's table for action now.

Mr. WHITE. I object for this reason: the representation of the Yellowstone Cañon is not a true one; and it will do the country injustice to exhibit it as proposed.

Mr. WADDELL. The gentleman may be a very fine art critic; but he does not concur with other people who I think have had equal facilities with himself for forming an opinion on questions of this sort.

Mr. WHITE. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. EAMES. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] who is not now in the House expressed some objection to this proposition.

Mr. WADDELL. I do not think he will offer any objection when he understands the matter. The proposition met with no opposition in the Senate; it was passed there unanimously. Early action on the question is of some importance to the artist; and that is my reason for making the unusual request to take the resolution from the Speaker's table.

Mr. EAMES. I object in behalf of the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WADDELL. I ask then for a vote on the motion to go to the Speaker's table. That does not require unanimous consent, I believe.

The joint resolution was read. It proposes to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to permit Thomas Moran to exhibit at the international exposition at Philadelphia the two paintings executed by himself, entitled "The Cañons of the Yellowstone" and the "Chasms of the Colorado;" provided the said Moran shall cause the same to be insured to the satisfaction of the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress for the benefit of the United States against loss by accident or otherwise, and shall return the same to their places in the Capitol on or before the 1st day of December next.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Can this proposition be entertained while the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. EAMES] objects to its consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] asked unanimous consent to take up the joint resolution. Objection was made by the gentleman from Rhode Island. The gentleman from North Carolina now proposes, as the Chair understands, to move to go to the Speaker's table.

Mr. WADDELL. Yes, sir; I make that motion.

Mr. HALE. Can that motion be made till after the morning hour?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It cannot; and there has been no morning hour to-day.

SANTILLAN LAND GRANT.

Mr. PARSONS. I am directed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to submit a report on the bill (H. R. No. 1390) relative to the Santillan land grant in the southern portion of the city and county of San Francisco, State of California. The matters embraced in the report are of such importance that we think further consideration by the committee necessary; and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the report be printed and recommitted.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

SURVEY OF BIG SANDY RIVER.

Mr. WHITE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2933) authorizing the survey of the Tug Fork of the Big Sandy River from Warfield, Kentucky, to a point on said Tug River five miles above the Roughs of Tug; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, for one week on account of illness in his family; to Mr. FREEMAN for the remainder of the present week; and to Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, until Saturday next.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOAR, (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CAMPBELL: The petition of M. H. Shinn and 127 others, of Henry County, Illinois, for the immediate repeal of the act of 14th of January, 1875, known as the resumption act, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. CATE: The petition of the members of the lodge of Good Templars of Bloomer, Wisconsin, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. CLYMER: The petition of citizens of Birdsborough, Berks County, Pennsylvania, against a revision of the tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of citizens of Berks County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of citizens of Reading, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Union soldiers, that all sailors and soldiers who served in the Navy or Army thirty days be granted one hundred and sixty acres of land and $200 in money, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. FORNEY: The petition of citizens of Bibb County, Alabama, relative to the destruction of the Methodist Episcopal church at Randolph, in said county, by United States troops under the command of General Wilson in 1865, and asking an appropriation for the rebuilding of same, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HOAR: Papers relating to the petition of Isaac S. Lyon for relief, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HOPKINS: Remonstrance of 230 workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, against a reduction of the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, remonstrance of many workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. HUBBELL: The petition of A. J. Sensabaugh, T. C. Anderson, and 21 other citizens of Frankfort, Michigan, for an appropriation to construct a keeper's dwelling for a light-house at that place, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of James Burk, for compensation for schooner called O. K., seized by United States authorities and sold as a prize, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. HURD: The petition of J. W. Nelson and other citizens of Ohio, for the repeal of the resumption act, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. KASSON: The petition of Professor Henry H. McAfee and Professor Albert N. Prentiss, for the appointment of a commission to investigate the causes that produce, and to suggest means to prevent, losses to the agricultural interests of the country, to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of S. Foster, vice-president of the American Pomological Society, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. KEHR: Remonstrance of citizens of South Saint Louis, Missouri, against a reduction of the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of rectifiers and wholesale dealers of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, that the powers and duties of officers of internal revenue be defined, and to further provide for the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, to the same committee.

By Mr. KIMBALL: Memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, for the construction of fish-ways at the dams and locks on the Fox River, Wisconsin, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana: The petition of 150 workingmen of Indianapolis, Indiana, that the present tariff laws be left undisturbed, and that, when alterations are made at a more favorable time, Congress take counsel from its own countrymen and constituents, rather than from the industrial and commercial enemies of the country, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LANE: Resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Portland, Oregon, relative to harbor and river improvements in the State of Oregon, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Remonstrance of the workingmen in the Philadelphia Scale-Works against disturbing the provisions of the existing tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. PIPER: Concurrent resolution of the Legislature of California asking that certain lands, withdrawn from market under the pretense of a grant to railroads, be restored to the public domain, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. JOHN REILLY: The petition of 30 citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, against any change in the present tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of 46 citizens of Bedford County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 78 citizens of Blair County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of 36 soldiers in the late war, for a grant of one hundred and sixty acres of land and $200, to enable them to settle thereon, to all Union soldiers of the late war, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. SINNICKSON: The petition of R. C. Sykes and other citizens of Vineland, New Jersey, for the abolition of the stamp tax on safety matches, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of Louis Bristol and others, for the repeal of the resumption act and that the Government may issue notes directly from the Treasury calculated to serve as the money of the country, to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

By Mr. SPRINGER: The petition of T. M. D. Richards, L. R. Bryant, and other citizens of Illinois and Ohio, for the appointment of a commission to investigate the causes that produce and to suggest means to prevent losses to the agricultural interests of the country, to the Committee on Agriculture.

Also, the petition of Edmund Hathaway, vice-president State Farmers' Association of Illinois, and other citizens of Illinois, Maryland, Nebraska, Missouri, and Indiana, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Marshal P. Wilder, president of the American Pomological Society, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of A. G. Humphrey, vice-president Central Illinois Horticultural Society, and others, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE, of Ohio: The petition of Thomas J. Williams and 50 other workingmen of Jackson County, Ohio, that the present tariff laws be left undisturbed, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of A. Magoon and 118 other workingmen of Hocking County, Ohio, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WHEELER: Papers relating to the claim of Amos B. King for moiety of fine imposed on Louis Paltz in the United States district court at Buffalo, New York, in September, 1874, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS: The petition of Thomas Tracy, for relief, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. WOOD, of Pennsylvania: The petition of Samuel McCarter and 41 other persons of Montgomery County, Pennsylvania, against any change in the existing tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2736) to remove the political disabilities of N. H. Van Zandt, of Virginia, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 2827) for the relief of Stephen Hall was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CONKLING. I present a petition, numerously signed by workingmen of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York, protesting against revisions of the tariff which they understand to be proposed in the other House. I move its reference to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONKLING. I present also a concurrent resolution of the two houses of the Legislature of the State of New York, touching the threatened repeal of the resumption act, so called, and I ask that it may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK, IN ASSEMBLY,
Albany, March 1, 1876.

On motion of Mr. Fish,

Whereas the commercial and industrial interests of the country require a settled, steady, and uniform financial policy on the part of the Government; and whereas the public honor, credit, and safety, as well as the restoration of commercial confidence and prosperity, demand that this policy, by gradual and prudent steps toward the resumption of specie payments, shall establish a sound and stable currency, based upon the world's standard of coin; and whereas the act of Congress approved January 14, 1875, provides for and pledges the Government to a resumption of specie payments on the 1st of January, 1879: Therefore,

Resolved, (if the senate concur,) That our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to oppose any repeal of the said resumption act of January 14, 1875, and that they be also requested to favor such further legislation as may be needed to give full faith and force to the pledge contained in said act, and thereby to insure the permanent restoration of specie payments.

By order.

EDW. M. JOHNSON, Clerk.

IN SENATE, March 2, 1876.

Concurred in without amendment.

By order.

HENRY A. GLIDDEN, Clerk.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the resolution be printed and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. I present the petition of L. Williams and several other citizens of Big Lake, Minnesota, stating among other things "that transporting small articles by mail at a moderate cost is of immense advantage to millions of people; that it enables families to interchange small articles; that it enables the people in the Territories and newly-settled regions to procure at the same price which is charged in larger cities hundreds of small articles of luxury and convenience of which they would otherwise be deprived, and thereby promotes the settlement of such portions of the country; wherefore your petitioners pray that the law increasing the postage on merchandise be repealed, and a law enacted authorizing the transmission of merchandise in packages of four pounds or less through the mails at a postage of one-half cent an ounce." I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a petition of citizens of Oregon, praying that Congress may grant to the State of Oregon for the purpose of a State insane asylum the lands and buildings known as the Dalles military reservation. This petition is numerously signed, and contains the following indorsement by General Howard, in command of the Department of the Columbia:

The old fort will probably never be used again for military purposes, and I do not know of a better disposition of the land and old buildings than to devote them to the purposes of an asylum as proposed.

O. O. HOWARD.

I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL presented a petition of surviving officers, soldiers, sailors, marines, and Government employés who served in the war against Mexico, now residing in the State of Oregon and Washington Territory, praying Congress that their services be recognized to the same extent and in the same manner as have been those of those who served in the war of 1812; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KERNAN presented a memorial of citizens of the counties of Essex and Clinton, in the State of New York, remonstrating against a reduction of duty on imports; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. I also present the petition of Mary Bennett, praying for arrears of pension from October 9, 1872, to December 16, 1875. I ask the attention of the Committee on Pensions particularly to this case. This seems to be a woman without friends. The petition shows that she perfected her papers on her aplication on the 9th of October, 1872, her son having been in the Army; that she made various inquiries through an attorney; heard nothing; and called in August, 1875, to find that all her papers had been lost in the removal of the Office from the main building to the Seaton House. She then again applied with new papers, and her pension was granted from that time. She prays for arrears between the time when she perfected her application, her papers having since been lost, and the time when the pension was granted upon new testimony. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDOLPH presented a memorial of citizens of Sussex County, New Jersey, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. President, I hold in my hand a letter from General Nelson A. Miles, of the United States Army, and I desire to present it in the shape of a petition for reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs. It is a petition praying that $5,000 of the appropriation to be made for the Cheyenne Indians be set apart for the benefit of two young white girls who were carried away and kept in captivity by the Indians for several months, and suffered every atrocity except death. I move its reference to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. DENNIS presented a memorial of 121 citizens of Frederick County, Maryland, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Good Templars of Maryland, officially signed, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of George May Powell, chairman of the forest committee of the farmers' club, American Institute; Charles L. Flint, secretary of the Massachusetts State Board of Agriculture; Samuel Bowles, John A. Dix, Peter Cooper, and others, praying Congress to consider favorably the proposed amendment to the forestry laws. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Lucas County, Ohio, remonstrating against any change in the tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McDONALD presented the memorial of Aquilla Jones, Isaiah Stott, and others, of Marion County, Indiana, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BOUTWELL presented the memorial of the heirs of Daniel Hayward, for the extension of his patent for the manufacture of India rubber; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of several hundred citizens of Manchester, New Hampshire, asking for the repeal of the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented the memorial of Augustus H. Kilty, a rear-admiral on the retired list of the Navy, praying to be allowed the pay of his grade from the date of his promotion; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

FANNIE E. RECORDS.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to allow me to enter a motion to reconsider a vote of the Senate by which an adverse report from the Committee on Pensions was adopted upon House bill No. 1811, granting a pension to Fannie E. Records. I think there may be some other evidence furnished that may change the opinion of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine enters a motion for the reconsideration of the bill he has named.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2447) transferring the custody of certain Indian trust funds, reported it without amendment.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,'" reported it with amendments.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the morning business concluded?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not concluded. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. DORSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 634) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the joint-stock company of the Young Men's Christian Association of Washington," approved March 2, 1867, to report it back with an amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that ought to go on the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California objects to its present consideration, and the bill will be placed upon the Calendar.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1595) for the relief of John T. Burchell, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for services rendered the Government in a small-pox hospital, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

DEPOSIT OF INDIAN FUNDS.

Mr. ALLISON. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 614) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment, to report it without amendment, and I move that it be put upon its passage now.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to deposit in the Treasury of the United States any and all sums now held by him, or which may hereafter be received by him, as Secretary of the Interior and trustee of various Indian tribes, on account of the redemption of United States bonds, or other stocks and securities belonging to the Indian trust fund, whenever he is of the opinion that the best interests of the Indians will be promoted by such deposits, in lieu of investments, and provides that the United States shall pay interest semi-annually, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from the date of deposit of any and all such sums in the United States Treasury.

Mr. ALLISON. I would just say in relation to this bill that under the order of the Secretary of the Treasury several United States bonds have been redeemed, and the Secretary of the Interior thinks he ought not to re-invest in United States bonds. Therefore he asks that the sum may be placed to the credit of these Indians.

Mr. SARGENT. I will not object if the bill can be passed without debate.

Mr. KERNAN. I was unable to quite hear the purport of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. It simply authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to place to the credit of certain Indian tribes funds now in his hands which arise from the redemption of United States bonds.

Mr. KERNAN. It does not affect the Indian tribes in New York?

Mr. ALLISON. In no sense.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MANUFACTURE OF POSTAL CARDS.

Mr. WEST. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2821) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It appropriates $62,300 for the purpose named.

Mr. WEST. I will merely state in regard to the bill that it is to supply a deficiency arising from the fact of there being an extraordinary demand in the postal service for this method of postal communication.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the bill? Let it be reported again.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. It is all right.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TURTLE MOUNTAIN INDIANS.

Mr. BOGY. I am instructed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) for the relief of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians, to report it back without amendment, and to ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It confers authority on the Secretary of the Interior to pay out of the funds appropriated for the support of the Indian Bureau a sufficient amount to pay the board bill while in Washington, and transportation to their home, of the delegation of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians, consisting of Little Shell, the chief of the band, and three headmen, all Indians, and one interpreter; but the amount is not to exceed $1,000.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 667) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to make just compensation for the past making or use or vending of his patent explosive shell, fuses, and percussion exploders by the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 668) for the relief of the mission of Saint James, of Washington Territory; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 669) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to set aside a reservation for the Turtle band of Chippewa Indians and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 670) for the relief of Jacob Fresh; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOOTH asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 671) granting pensions to dependent brothers and sisters of James S. Selford; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SPENCER (by request of the District commissioners) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 672) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to sell certain real estate in the District of Columbia, and in lieu thereof to purchase certain other real estate for similar municipal purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

He also (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 673) to ascertain the interest of the heirs of Daniel Carroll, of Duddington, and to secure the conveyance of the same to the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 674) for the relief of W. H. Woodward, of Indianola, Texas; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the petition and papers of Mrs. H. L. Gamble be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. There is no report in the case.

The motion was agreed to.

BANKRUPTCY CASES IN TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. SARGENT. If the morning hour has expired I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business.

Mr. THURMAN. Before that is done will the Senator allow me a moment? I ask the Senate to consider House bill No. 356. It will give rise to no discussion. There will be no objection to it, I am sure.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not want to interfere with the Senator from Ohio, but I have given way twice, and once this morning, after being recognized by the Chair, to morning business, wanting, as I do, to have considered a little bill from the Committee on Commerce. If this bill of the Senator's is not to take any time, I do not want to interfere with it.

Mr. THURMAN. It will take but a moment, if the Senator will let me state what it is. Jurisdiction in bankruptcy originally was conferred upon the supreme courts of the Territories. It was afterward taken away from those courts and conferred upon the district courts of the Territories, after a number of cases had been brought in the supreme courts; but no provision was made for transferring the papers in pending cases from the supreme courts to the district courts. The consequence is that in the Territories the supreme courts cannot proceed in the cases that were pending in them because their jurisdiction has been taken away, and the district courts cannot proceed because they have no papers. This bill simply is to authorize the transfer of the papers from the supreme courts, whose jurisdiction has been taken away, to the district courts, upon whom we have conferred jurisdiction. There cannot certainly be any objection to the bill. I will also state that it does not in any wise affect the question whether the bankrupt law should be repealed or not. Whether the bankrupt law shall be repealed or shall not be repealed, this provision in regard to cases actually pending, but which are blocked in the way that I have stated, is necessary and ought to be made. I hope the bill will be taken up and passed without any discussion at all. That is all I have to say about it.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PONTON BRIDGE AT LA CROSSE.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Just one moment. I move that the Senate now take up Senate bill No. 336, to authorize the construction of a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River at La Crosse, which was reported the other day from the Committee on Commerce. I think there will be no objection to it.

Mr. SARGENT. I must object. Let the bill go on the Calendar and be taken up in its regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is on the Calendar, and the Senator from Wisconsin moves to take it up.

Mr. SARGENT. I think I must appeal to the Senate to enable me to proceed with the unfinished business.

Mr. CONKLING. The morning hour has not expired.

Mr. SARGENT. The regular morning business has concluded.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has not expired.

Mr. SARGENT. If I am out of order I will not insist.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is subject to the will of the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to antagonize the Senate. If they desire to take up the time until one o'clock with miscellaneous business I will submit.

Mr. CONKLING. I believe the Senator from California is one of the few Senators to whom I have not given way after I had the floor, and therefore I cannot take any exception to his objecting; but if anybody else should object it would be some one to whom I have yielded the floor once or twice when endeavoring to have considered a very brief bill of no particular interest to me, which concerns the form of bonds to be given by importers; and if neither the Senator from California nor any other Senator objects now, or asks me to give way, I will venture to ask the Senate to take up this very brief bill from the House.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I understood that the Senator from New York gave way to me a moment ago. My bill would have been passed before now if there had been no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to take up Senate bill No. 336. It will be reported for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, it does seem to me that a bill of this character ought to be very well examined before we pass upon it. If I understand the bill aright, it will destroy the navigation of the Mississippi River at that point. A ponton-bridge cannot otherwise than be injurious to navigation. Of course, from the mere reading of the bill I cannot exactly tell; but I will object to the passage of the bill without very serious examination, because it is a matter of very great importance. Heretofore we have been extremely guarded in the construction of bridges over the Mississippi River, providing that they should be so constructed as not in any way to affect navigation. There is a general law on that subject; and heretofore no ponton-bridges have ever been authorized. It is a matter of too much importance to the entire navigation, both below and above this point, to pass a bill of this kind without very serious examination. I therefore object, though the bill may be all right.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. The bill was introduced early in the session and referred to the Committee on Commerce. It was carefully considered by that committee and was reported favorably upon a few days ago. It was referred by the Committee on Commerce to the War Department for information; and there is a communication from the Secretary of War on file with the bill, which is very brief, and I ask that that communication be now read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will be read.

Mr. BOGY. A bill of this character ought to go upon the Calendar and be examined carefully and not be passed in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has moved to take it from the Calendar. The question is on that motion.

Mr. WINDOM. I should like to have some further understanding of this bill before voting upon it. I do not understand whether this is to be a railroad bridge or a wagon bridge from the reading of the bill. Will the Senator from Wisconsin state that?

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. A railroad or wagon bridge.

Mr. WINDOM. If that be the case, I think, as the Senator from Missouri has suggested, it ought to be considered further. I do not know that I shall oppose it; but I want an opportunity to examine it.

Mr. CONKLING. Let it lie over.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. As there seems to be considerable objection to it, I will waive the consideration of the bill at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin withdraws his motion.

CUSTOM-HOUSE BONDS.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate now consider House bill No. 2135.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The Committee on Commerce reported an amendment to the bill, to strike out in lines 5 and 6 the words "or for the use and benefit of;" so as to make the bill read:

That when any bond is required by law to be executed by any firm or partnership for the payment of duties upon goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States by such firm or partnership, the execution of such bond by any member of such firm or partnership, in the name of said firm or partnership, shall bind the other members or partners thereof in like manner and to the same extent as if such other members or partners had personally executed the same; and any action or suit may be instituted on such bond against all the members or partners of such firm, as if all of the members or partners had executed the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2934) to provide for the expenses of admission of foreign goods to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 252) donating the military road running from Astoria, Oregon, to Salem, in that State, to the several counties through which it passes; and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to confine debate on amendments to this appropriation bill by any Senator on the pending motion to five minutes, under the rule adopted early in the session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the reading of the rule to which I refer.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator from California has drawn my attention to the fact that under the rule adopted by the Senate this motion is not debatable. If I could have the permission of the Senate, I should like to say a few words. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment, that I may state one or two reasons why I think it would be advisable not to press the rule in relation to this bill, or at least not until something is settled in regard to the way we are to consider it. If he will withdraw his motion for a moment, I will state my view very shortly.

Mr. SARGENT. Certainly I will do so.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senate are aware that the practice of legislation by appropriation bills has been for the last sixteen years or more in accordance with the action of the House of Representatives at the present session, and that no objection has been entertained favorably by those who have had the control of the business of this body during that period to restrain the operation of appropriation bills simply to the provision of money to carry into effect existing laws. Practice and custom become law; they are recognized as law in all tribunals and in all bodies; and this practice has been so invariable under, as I say, the controlling majorities of both Houses of Congress for a great many years past, that it was not to be expected that suddenly and without notice the practice would be changed at the present session of Congress.

I said yesterday that I quite agreed with the principle and the rule of confining appropriation bills to their defined and proper jurisdiction, and that is the provision of money only to carry existing laws into effect. But such has not been the custom of these two bodies; and one co-ordinate branch of Congress, acting under this understanding, has spent several months in attempted reforms of legislation by way of amendment to the salaries of officers, the consolidation of the duties of various officers, and have sent the result of their labors to this body for its concurrence.

Now, for the first time, and from quarters which heretofore have been either silent on the subject or opposed to the very proposition they now make, comes the objection that it is not legitimate to amend existing laws through the machinery of appropriation bills. I submit to the good sense of the Senate and of the country that while the change in the practice of the two bodies is amenable to reason, at the same time it would be exceedingly unwise, unjust, improper, and detrimental to the public interests if, in this sudden manner, the practice of the two Houses is changed, and the Senate shall agree that at the present session no amendment to existing laws shall be made through the machinery of changing the amount of appropriations in the appropriation bills.

If it be the will of the Senate to accept this proposition in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] I think as made the other day, then let it be known at once, and by a vote of the Senate, that they propose now, off-hand, to inaugurate a new system in respect of legislation, and without a joint rule or a rule of either House for the purpose, without notification to the co-ordinate branch of Congress, to reject every appropriation bill which comes to you in a shape that in any degree alters the existing laws which those appropriations are intended to keep in effect. If such be the resolve of the majority, if such has been their pre-ordained action, then let us simply know it. I do not think it reasonable, I do not think it just, suddenly and in this manner to change the whole custom of Congress for years back in respect to appropriation bills.

I have stated most freely and candidly, as is my wont, that I believe the system of amending laws in your appropriation bills is unwise, and I have striven, against the vote of the majority of the Senate, to prevent general legislation from being ingrafted upon these mere money bills, and heretofore my objection has been made in vain. I yesterday referred to this, and upon subsequent examination of the record of the debates of this body find that on the 1st of March of the present year, when this rule which has been cited by the honorable Senator from California, and under which he now proposes to act, was before the Senate, I then asked by an amendment that matters germane only to the subject-matter of the bill should be permitted to be ingrafted upon appropriation bills, and the Senate by a vote, and that vote composed almost strictly on the respective sides of the majority and minority parties of this body, refused to permit so reasonable and just an amendment, as I considered it then and now, to be made to the proposition. But letting that go by, it still shows what was on the 1st of March the opinion and feeling of this body in respect of having amendments to existing legislation made through the forms and machinery of the appropriation bills.

I submit, therefore, that at the present session we proceed in the proper temper of legislators to consider the wisdom or the unwisdom of the action of the House, and to pass upon it our independent and our conscientious judgment; that each amendment as it comes here shall be considered upon its merits and be debated upon its merits. Thus, if it be in the discretion of the honorable Senator having charge of the bill to move that the five-minute rule shall apply, I will yield to his discretion, although I think there has been no time wasted upon this bill. Surely there has been no loss of time. Perhaps it would be wise in a measure of this kind not to enforce this limitation of debate. I am also aware that, should a question of unusual interest arise on any amendment in which any Senator was disposed to ask the Senate for a longer time for its consideration, there would be no practical difficulty in its being granted, according to our practice. I therefore would leave it entirely to the discretion of the honorable Senator having charge of the bill, who has more responsibility than any other one of us on the subject, and who, I am sure, will use his discretion as he should; but I submit to him whether he will see fit on the present bill to ask for the enforcement of this rule.

But before that question is put I submit to the Senate whether there is to be any such understanding as that, because these appropriation bills which are just beginning to come to this body contain amendments of existing legislation, they are en masse to be non-concurred in by the Senate for that reason. If that be the resolve, or if there be any such understanding, I think it is important for the business of the country that it should be known at once; and I think it is just to the co-ordinate branch of Congress that they should understand it that the Senate now, in reversal of its former uniform practice, I venture to say, on this subject for many, many years, proposes to adopt, not a rule of its own or a joint rule, but to adopt a course of action in regard to appropriation bills that shall prevent any amendment which changes existing law, whether in the amount of salaries or the number of officials, from receiving the concurrence of this body.

I say this because it is proper that we should have a full and free understanding on this subject. If there can be a proposition to remedy this vicious system of legislation of ingrafting upon general appropriation bills amendments of a general legislative character totally incongruous, totally inconsistent, not germane in any way to the subject-matter of the bill, no one will be more happy to support it now, as I have done always in the past since my entrance into this body. But I submit that, standing as we do, in the relation to public business and to the co-ordinate branch of Congress, we should pass upon the amendments proposed by them on these bills upon their merits without regard to the question of the propriety or impropriety as a matter of legislation of changing existing laws by amendments to the appropriation bills.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I do not desire to be understood, by asking that the five-minute limitation be applied to this bill, that I have observed anything like factious opposition to the progress of the bill or to anything contained in it. I have not. I do not make the motion in that sense. My impression is that my friends on my right have done as much talking, and perhaps more, than those on my left. I do not make the motion in that spirit, but simply because I desire to make some progress with the bill. I have given two full days to debate on general principles, and I think pretty much all has been said in that aspect of the subject that any Senator desires to say; but if more is desired, it can easily be done under the five-minute rule. More than that, I believe that where a Senator has asked to be heard at further length, where the rule was operating, that request has been unanimously and cheerfully accorded to. Of course the Senator does not ask that, under the rule, unless in a proper case.

I have heard no one announce that it is the purpose of the Senate or of the Committee on Appropriations to reject all items of reduction in an appropriation bill simply because they work a change in existing laws. That is not the purpose at all. I have explained over and over again in regard to this bill, that the public service, so far as the consular system is concerned, is more than self-supporting; that the diplomatic service is economically paid, and that the amount of payment was fixed twenty years ago, and fixed under influences very different from those now existing. I do not wish to go into a discussion of the manner in which rules may have been changed in one House or the other, to make in order the kind of bill which we have received and which was before us some days ago and sent to the Committee on Appropriations. I hardly know how I could do it without transcending the rules of the Senate. I therefore will not attempt to follow the Senator from Delaware in that particular; but for the reasons which I have given, not finding fault with any one, and only desiring to make progress with the business in my charge, I renew my motion that the further debate on amendments to this bill be confined to five minutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California moves that the debate on amendments to this bill be confined to five minutes by each Senator. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the pending amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The pending amendment is to insert after line 38 the following clause:

For salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Chili and Peru, at $10,000 each, $20,000.

For ministers resident at Portugal, Switzerland, Greece, Belgium, Netherlands, Denmark, Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Ecuador, Colombia, Bolivia, Venezuela, Hawaiian Islands, and the Argentine Republic, at $7,500 each, $105,000.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I shall endeavor to state as briefly as I can my views upon this subject. If I should prolong my remarks beyond the five minutes accorded me, I trust the Senator from California will permit me to go on.

I agree fully with Senators who have spoken on the subject, that bad customs ought to be abolished; and if the custom of making amendments which are to become general laws on appropriation bills has grown up in the Senate, it is time it should be abolished, and I will go with the Senator in his movement in that direction. But, sir, this is not the time nor the occasion to correct that practice. These amendments affect the burdens of the people, and in my judgment the hour has come in which we must use law, practice, custom, and every other power that is given to us as a parliamentary body under the law of the country, to reduce and lessen those burdens. If a technical rule is in the way, and that rule has been ameliorated by practice and custom, we should stand by that practice and custom; for it is in a good cause—the cause of the people themselves. When the time comes to enact a rule or a statute that gives the form of legislation in the proper direction, I will go with the Senator; but now that the industries of the people are paralyzed, that the people are suffering, it is no time for the introduction of technicalities or persistent adherence to rules. We ought to follow practice in a good cause. The Senate cannot sustain itself against a just demand for retrenchment upon any such technical position. If it has been the practice of this body for sixteen years to reduce appropriations in appropriation bills over the law, then this is not the hour in which the Senate can sustain itself in the face of the country in retracing its steps upon that practice.

Mr. President, enough upon that subject. Let us take the bill as we find it, and see what it is. In justice to myself I must say that I was not with the committee who considered this bill. I was confined to my room and was unable to be with the committee, so that I did not aid in the consideration of it; but I take the bill as I find it, as it comes to the Senate from the House, and I see that it reduces the cost of the diplomatic service proper $168,500. How are these reductions made? By reducing four first-class missions from $17,500 to $14,000; by reducing the mission to Italy from $12,000 to $8,000; by reducing six other missions from $12,000 to $10,000; by consolidating the small missions to the South American states; by consolidating those to the small European states; by reducing the mission to the Hawaiian Islands from $7,500 to $3,500; by dropping Hayti, a $7,500 mission, and sending there a consul; by reducing the amount given for ad interim officers $20,000; by reducing the contingent expenses for foreign intercourse from $100,000 to $50,000. All of these the Senate committee restore, and ask that the bill thus amended and increased shall be placed upon the statute-book; that the $168,500 deducted by the House from the diplomatic service shall be restored in word and letter.

What are the reasons given for this? They are, first, because the law so provides. This is no good reason, as I have already said, under the existing condition of affairs. Second, because there has been no change in these figures for twenty years. The Senator from California is mistaken; the statutes show that he is mistaken. Compare 1870 with 1876, and you will demonstrate by facts, figures, and the law itself, that there have been increases and changes made. In 1870 there were appropriated for diplomatic salaries $357,850; in 1876 and by this bill there are appropriated for diplomatic salaries $391,500. There were appropriated in 1870 for contingent expenses $100,000, and there are appropriated now $100,000. Here is a difference as between 1870 and 1876; not years before the war, but between 1870, when expenses were higher and the cost of living greater than they are now; and the present time, of $33,650. How? Why? Germany and Russia, under statutes called appropriation bills, are increased from $12,000 to $17,500 each; Japan is increased from $7,500 to $12,000; the secretaries of legations and interpreters from $33,000 to $38,000. These increases are found in appropriation bills, and they are the growth of a system which inevitably presses itself forward and will not stop. Expenses grow imperceptibly. Senators know that as well as I. It is not necessary to stop to prove it. The power in control is unable to stop. The people alone can halt them. They grow under the hands of power, and those who rule cannot stop them if they would.

We receive twenty-two ministers and we send abroad thirty-one. In the face of this is there no propriety in making changes or reductions? Is not the consolidation of missions wise? It is said it is against the interests of commerce. Let us take a specimen of the commerce affected by the very amendment pending, and see how that question is changed by our examination.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BAYARD. I ask that the time of the Senator from Pennsylvania be extended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WALLACE. The Argentine Republic, which is a full mission at $7,500, was found in 1870 to have imports from us to the amount of $6,414,669. By the tables in 1875 she is found to have but $5,831,709, a positive decrease of more than half a million. It was less in 1874, for then they were but $4,537,000. In 1870 her domestic exports were $2,281,100; in 1875 they were $1,301,294. Here is a specimen of the growth of commerce in a mission which is restored, over the protest of the other branch of Congress, to the full amount of $7,500.

Take Peru. In 1870 her imports were $2,557,833; in 1875 they were $1,344,595; and from 1870 to 1875 there have been steady decreases. In 1870 her domestic exports were $3,677,262; in 1875, $2,443,657; and in 1874 they were $2,518,000. Yet Peru is restored as a full $10,000 mission. The bill as it came to the Senate consolidates Peru, a mission of $10,000, with Ecuador and Colombia at $7,500 each—$25,000 of expenditures are reduced to $6,500, and the Senate bill restores the full figures. Here is a difference of $18,500 placed upon this bill over the protest of the House, in the face of facts and figures that the commerce of the United States with those countries has in the past six years absolutely diminished. What vindication can there be in the face of these figures for the increase of these missions over the figures sent to us by the House of Representatives?

The mission to Switzerland, reduced to $6,500 by the House, is increased to $7,500. She sends here no minister; her whole foreign policy as I find it written in 1872 costs her but about $42,000. Italy by this amended bill is restored to a full mission at $12,000, while the bill as it came to us gave but $8,000. Here is a difference of $4,000. If $8,000 in currency be sufficient for the salary of one of your Cabinet ministers, why is not $8,000 in gold enough to pay the salary of your minister to Italy? I think the country will conclude as the House did upon that subject.

The service will not suffer. Good men are plenty who will take these missions; in the republican party, even, they are without number. The true policy of the Government is not extravagance or display, but it is moderation and simplicity. When we vote large amounts of money those who have their expenditure will inevitably be extravagant; a man with a full pocket will spend more money than a man who has comparatively an empty one, to bring into this argument the homely doctrine of individual and every-day life, and that is the doctrine the House has applied here. They are the immediate representatives of the people; they hold the purse, and if their advice is not to be hearkened to on these questions, where shall we get advice?

Now we come to the consular system, for I have thus far confined myself exclusively to the diplomatic service. The bill as it came to us acted upon principle. I do not admit and I cannot agree to the proposition that the bill as it came from the House was a simple hewing and hacking and cutting without foresight or without thought. There is system in those reductions, and at the base of that system lies the idea that reduction of salaries, decrease of expenditures, a lessening of the burdens of the people are the pressing demands of the hour, and that we and they shall be faithless to our duty to the people if we do not lessen these expenses and reduce appropriations accordingly.

The principle upon which the bill as it came to us was based seems to be, first, reduction wherever compatible with the interests of the public service; second, no business, no consulate. Where there is no business to do, why should we have a consul with a large salary? Where there is a comparatively small amount of business, the House sends a consular agent with fees. Where there are but small amounts of business and the fees are trifling and you find, as in one case which the Senate committee has restored, a consulate with $2,000 and but $37 fees, is it wise to continue such a case and such a policy? As the bill came to us it left a consul at every port at which American vessels touch, some with salaries and some with fees. I aver that it is wrong to pay a two-thousand-dollar salary per annum to a consul when the port returns us but $200 fees. Both economy and common sense dictate that there should be some change in such a policy and such a system. I quote now what the bill as it came to us effects:

> The salaries of forty-five consulates are abolished and the salaries of others are reduced. Three of the consulates whose salaries are abolished paid the consuls $3,500 each, or $10,500. The fees collected at these places for the year ending December 31, 1874, were only $1,159.29. The salaries paid exceeded the fees received by $9,340.71. One of the consulates abolished—Hakodadi, in Japan—paid its consul a salary of $2,500 per annum. The fees collected at this place for the year ending December 31, 1874, amounted to $303.06; loss to the Government, $2,496. Seven other consulates were in class V, and paid each a salary of $2,000; total, $14,000. The whole amount of fees collected at these consulates for the year ending December 31, 1874, was $1,757.79; loss to the Government, $12,242.21. Eighteen other consulates belonged to class VI, and paid a salary of $1,500 each to the consuls; total cost to the Government, $12,000. These consulates, for the year ending June 30, 1875, paid fees to the amount of $4,605.03. The excess of salaries paid over fees received was $7,394.97. Sixteen of these consulates where salaries are abolished were in class VII, and paid salaries of $1,000 each, or $16,000 in all.
> The whole amount of fees collected at these consulates for the year ending June 30, 1875, was $3,245.60. The excess of salaries paid over fees received was $12,754.40.
> In all the consulates where salaries are abolished the fees collected were only $11,070.79, while the salaries paid were $58,000, showing an excess of $46,929.21 of amount of salaries paid over fees received.

The Senate bill restores all these, Hakodadi included, as I understand the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.] He says:

> The bill which I hold in my hand, as it passed the House of Representatives, appropriated $912,747.50. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate have reported it back, with amendments, so that the amount is $1,341,647.50. The amount of appropriations last year was $1,374,985. That is to say, the bill which we now report to the Senate makes appropriations less than those made last year by $33,337.50. These additions made by the Senate committee to the House bill are strictly in accordance with the service of last year. There is not an instance where we have increased a salary or created an office. We have simply tried to preserve the integrity of the service for what we believe to be high public reasons. The reductions of $33,000 and over are from the causes which I will now state. Heretofore, and as the bill was passed by the House, the amanuensis of Mr. Schenck has been allowed $2,500 on account of the minister's crippled arm. He being no longer minister, that item is not necessary for next year.

We see from this that the bill as it came to us saved the people $462,238, as I believe without injuring the public service to the extent of one dollar. The Senate bill restores $428,901 thereof. It does not take one dollar off either the consular or diplomatic service proper, save Mr. Schenck's amanuensis, $2,500. Mr. Schenck having returned to the country, his amanuensis is not necessary. I speak, understand, of the consular and diplomatic service proper, not of those appropriations which come upon the bills as extraneous matter.

Now the reasons given for this restoration of $428,901 over the House appropriation bill are, first, the law. What law? The law that is written, says the Senator, upon the statute-book; but the law, as I read it, is not obeyed. Let us see; we take the Revised Statutes and read the law there, and then attempt to find what this bill does. I take the consul to London. I find the Revised Statutes give $7,500 salary, while this bill gives $6,000; to Paris, $5,000, and this bill gives $6,000; to Melbourne, $4,000, and this bill gives $4,500; to Kanagawa, $3,000, and this bill gives $4,000; to Vienna, $5,000, and this bill gives $3,000; to Rome, $1,500, and this bill gives $3,000; to Mexico, $1,000, and this bill gives $2,000; to Liverpool, $7,500, and this bill gives $6,000.

These are enough, it seems to me, to show departure from the law as written. But, says the Senator, this is not the law as written. If it be not the law as written, then the doctrine that we can and may make changes of salaries in appropriation bills comes home to the Senator and the Senate as late as 1874; for I find in the appropriation bill of 1874 the only authority given for these changes in the amounts appropriated to these different consuls. The Revised Statutes give the figures $7,500 for London, as an instance, while the appropriation bill of 1874 changes the law as found in the Revised Statutes, and reduces the consulate at London to $6,000, and the others that I have referred to follow in the same category. Here we bring the direct evidence, the clear proof, that the Senate committee has recognized the fact that changes can be made in appropriation bills affecting the public service. Here is a precedent that the Senate itself has made within two years; a precedent that it cannot violate in the present condition of the country.

The second reason given why these changes are made and the House bill is not permitted to exist as it was is, the necessities of commerce. Let us take some specimens on that subject, and see what the necessities of commerce are as affected by the Senate committee's amendments. The consul at Chin-Kiang, in China, is restored with a salary of $3,000. The fees shown by the report from official sources are $371.84. Ningpo is restored with a salary of $3,000, and the fees are $574.84. Swatow is restored with a salary of $3,500, and the fees are $316.84. Hakodadi is restored with a salary of $2,500, and the fees are $303.06. Odessa is restored with $2,000 salary, and the fees are $189.65. Tamatave, in Madagascar, is restored with $2,000 salary, while the fees are $37.42.

These, it seems to me, are ample to show that a consular agent with fees is all that is required there, when they are taken in connection with the fact that from 1870 to 1876 at most of these points commerce has decreased and not increased, and when the tabular statements and returns from the official sources show that the fees are vastly less than the salaries voted. There is no prohibition, as I understand it, forbidding consular agents who have charge of our affairs, where they receive fees, from engaging in business, but the contrary. The action of the other branch of Congress upon this subject may be harsh treatment to those who hold these sinecures; but is that any reason why we should not take a step in the direction of reduction of public expenses? The public good demands a reduction of public expenditure; and it is only when, in taking care of the public purse we destroy the public service, that we must be held up to an appropriation heretofore provided for by law. Commerce will not suffer. Senators need not be alarmed upon that subject. Substituting consuls with fees for consuls with salaries is no new policy. Again I quote:

> There are now eighty-nine consuls of the United States in different parts of the world who receive no salaries, among them the consul at Reims, in France, where the fees amount to $1,666.50; the consul at Brunswick, in Germany, whose fees amount to $2,498.25; the consul at Victoria, whose fees amount to $3,365.35, and many other places of equal importance. There are eighty-nine consuls who get no salary at this time, and only one hundred and eighty-eight consuls, consuls-general, and vice-consuls who receive salaries. Yet there are three hundred and fifty-seven consular agencies whose agents get no salaries, except the fees collected up to $1,000. The fees collected above that sum are paid over to the consul, who retains $1,000 from all his agencies and pays the balance into the Treasury.

Our consular officers under the Senate bill will be:

Salaried consuls, &c	188
Non-salaried consuls and consular agents	446

This is as it stands under the law now in force. Under the House bill it will be as follows:

Salaried consuls	145

It is said that this service is not increasing in cost. Let us see. Let us take official figures as the test; and I am willing to stand or fall upon those official figures; not those before the war, but long since the war when exchange was higher, when the cost of living was higher than it is now. Consular salaries in 1870 were $414,800; in 1876 and under this bill, for this bill follows the estimates of the Department, they are $546,400, making an increase from 1870 to 1876 of $131,600.

The contingent expenses of consulates in 1870 were $83,000; they are now $131,850, making an increase of $38,850. This whole increase is alarming, and it calls for reduction. Appropriations, it is true, must be based on our own judgment, but also upon the necessities of the people, and not upon the estimates of the Departments or enactments made through appropriation laws of the past.

Let us examine this matter in detail and I have done. Leaving out of view everything but the diplomatic and consular service proper, we find that in 1870 the diplomatic salaries proper were $357,850. Under the Senate bill they are $391,500. Contingent expenses of foreign intercourse were $100,000 then, and they are $100,000 now. Consular salaries then were $414,800; to-day they are $546,400. Then the contingent expenses of consulates were $83,000, and now by this bill they are $131,850. So that from 1870 to this bill and to the appropriations of last year, we find that they have increased from $955,650 to $1,169,750, making an increase since 1870 of $214,100.

So, too, with your aggregate ordinary net expenses. In 1870 they were $164,000,000; in 1872 they were but $153,000,000; in 1876 they are $179,000,000. Can the Government not be conducted as cheaply now as it was in 1872? Is there any reason why $15,000,000 of increase in the net ordinary expenses of the Government shall be made and approved from 1870 to 1876? If it be good doctrine to maintain sinecure consulates, to continue increases in diplomatic intercourse, if it be to keep thirty-one ministers abroad while we receive but twenty-two, if it be to maintain full missions where our commerce is decreasing—if that be the true policy of a suffering and plain people, then continue this policy. If it be not, let us hearken to the Representatives of that people when they send us their bills, and reduce and retrench where we can.

It is said by a Senator that this increase is the result of the war. I say, on the contrary it is the result of demoralization among the people and extravagance in governmental expenditure. Is it not the resistless force of power and public patronage impelling forward those who are in control? Power inevitably gathers to itself more and more as it goes forward. It is so with those who control the governmental forces now. They cannot stop if they would. They are pressed forward by the resistless force of the power that they themselves possess. The House representing the people, the branch of Congress that is nearest the people, invite us to retrench, to lessen their burdens, and in this bill to lessen them $462,000. This is the invitation of the people themselves. Is it not based upon their necessities? Is it not our plain, clear, and manifest duty so to do?

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, it is impossible of course to answer a three-quarters of an hour speech in five minutes, and yet I am under obligations not to occupy more than five minutes. I asked that debate be confined to that space, and I asked it because I felt that it was my duty to have this bill passed.

Mr. WALLACE. The Senator will permit me to say——

Mr. SARGENT. I am not complaining of the length of the Senator's speech, because I cheerfully assented to his going on. Many of the points the Senator has made, however, I explained before, as I thought very fully, and it is therefore unnecessary for me to pass upon those points again. There are some matters, however, which are so simple, that I am astonished the Senator in collating his figures overlooked them. If he had had the opportunity of studying the bill in committee as the rest of us had, I doubt not these matters would have been more impressed on his mind. For instance, he judges the value of a consulate by the amount of fees the consul collects. It is very well known that that collection is simply on the imports of the United States, and those duties which are there involved are the least important, the least valuable of the duties of a consul. The exports are not told by the fees and are not measured by the fees. Take the kingdom or empire of Hayti, or whatever it may be. Our imports from there are a few hundred thousand dollars, while our exports to Hayti, our goods which we sell to them, amount to many times that sum. All that business the consul assists. So I might go through the whole list. You cannot measure the importance or value of a consulate by the fees it collects; and therefore the reductions simply on the basis of fees are entirely unphilosophical, and we rejected them on that account.

The Senator says that our commerce is falling off with the South American republics. It is true to a certain extent, though not to a very large extent. But take it to the full extent that he has claimed, it might be doubtful whether we should withdraw all facilities for the use of that commerce. I have some figures here. Take the commerce with Peru or the Argentine Republic, amounting to millions of dollars of exports and imports. Shall we throw it away? Shall we abandon the means by which it is to be maintained? Is the commerce with South America of no value to our manufacturers; is it of no value to the Senator's own State and its great business port?

I adverted yesterday to one reason why our commerce does not grow so fast as the commerce of Great Britain, although the growth during the last four years, from 1870, has been gratifying. We have increased by some four hundred millions, as I stated yesterday. England gets the advantage of us, because it maintains great steamship lines to protect its commerce and extend it everywhere, and does it by subsidies. We may, of course, throw away all the example of the civilized world, that which springs from the advice of great merchants and commercial men in other countries and influences their governments. We can do that; and then we shall lose our commerce, and have only ourselves to complain of. We may withdraw all subsidies from anything like foreign steamship enterprises, as we have done; allow them to expire by limitation, and actually repeal them after they have been passed by Congress, and then complain because our commerce falls off!

These very South American republics to which the Senator refers pay more in the aggregate of consular fees by some $14,000 than we pay to the consuls after all the expenses of them are paid, including loss of exchange, &c. Commerce pays that tax. Should not commerce have the benefit? Is it intended that a tax shall be levied on our foreign commerce in this form for the purpose of replenishing the Treasury? If that is so, the theory of the House bill is correct. But let us see what Great Britain does. The United States through its consulates in the Argentine Republic, Brazil, Chili, Colombia, Ecuador, Peru, Uruguay, and Venezuela, some of which the Senator referred to, collects in fees from its own commerce $36,942.83, and pays out of this fund so raised, not from the Treasury, $34,500, making an excess of fees of $2,442.83. Ought we to take away the consul from Callao? Ought we to strike out the consuls from the Argentine Republic? Our commerce pays for them. The Senator knows, and everybody knows who has good sense, that where you take away a consul from a port your commerce will not seek that port. That is elementary.

Let us see what Great Britain does in these very countries. Great Britain pays for trade and commerce in this form £18,850, equal to $94,250, and collects in fees £4,657, equivalent to about $23,285. That is to say, Great Britain pays for the benefit of its trade out of its own treasury $69,070; by means of it her commerce extends, and by means of its other foreign policy to which I have adverted its commerce is built up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON in the chair.) The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. WALLACE. I hope the Senator's time will be extended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, the time of the Senator from California will be extended.

Mr. SARGENT. I hardly feel like availing myself of the permission of the Senate, as I have asked that the debate shall be confined to five minutes. It may be that in the progress of the bill I shall have occasion to refer further to some points of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations embraced between lines 39 and 46.

Mr. BAYARD. Upon the question of the amount of salaries, I may perhaps differ from some of the provisions of the House bill. I think it is a very dangerous proposition to pay men who are placed in positions of great responsibility sums of money not commensurate either with the grade of ability required for their office or with the responsibility of the place which they occupy. There are sometimes positions requiring great ability in connection with matters of but little importance. Others again require very little ability, but involve great responsibility, both pecuniarily and morally. All these things, however, are more properly adjusted by a thorough examination of the character of the duty imposed upon the party, and those would not naturally come within the knowledge of any members of the Senate so well as those who are placed in the committees to whose charge they have been especially committed.

This bill proposes now a consolidation of duties. There is one thing generally admitted I believe in this country, that the Government has more agents to perform its duties than any individual would employ if left to his own discretion, guided by an intelligent self-interest. Therefore, when upon diligent examination a committee of this body or a committee of the other House, and the other House acting under the guidance of their committee, shall declare that certain offices are unnecessary, and that a single individual can perform the duties theretofore executed by three or four or half a dozen, I think it is proper that their recommendation should be heeded. The bill as it came to us from the House of Representatives consolidated the embassies, if we may so call them, to Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia, into a single mission. The Senate committee preserves them all separate. The bill as it came to the Senate from the House provided for a minister resident at Peru, Ecuador, and Colombia, to reside at the place the President may select in either of those states, and fixed his salary at $6,500. The Senate committee propose to keep a separate minister at Peru, and pay him $10,000; to keep another at Ecuador, and pay him $7,500; and another at Colombia at $7,500. Now, sir, if one man can properly perform the duties of these three posts, or of these which have been three posts, I should think it perfectly reasonable that he should receive the pay proper to which either one, perhaps the most valuable, had been entitled before the adoption of this measure by the House. But it is plain to me that I ought not, nor do I feel justified in opposing my judgment as to the correction of this multiplicity of offices to the measure of reform of the House consolidating them. I do not like this reduction of salaries—I mean the reduction of the salaries of men placed in responsible positions. I believe it to be a false economy. There are times when the presence of an intelligent man of high character devoted to the interests of his country may be of such service to his country as makes the compensation in money of his salary infinitesimally small, and of no account whatever. We see that very often. It was but the mere flurry of an apprehended war, the mere threat of war in the fall of 1874, that added five millions to our debt, through the Navy Department alone, or something between four and five millions. That was simply because there was an expectation of a possibility of a war with Spain. A mere cloud upon the horizon caused this enormous addition to the public expenses. I do not mean to say that diplomacy could have averted that; I will not say it; but I say I can well understand how the presence of an agent of this Government in a foreign country where he had by his high tone of character obtained the respect of those who met him, by his amenity had gained the affections of those who met him, by his capacity had so informed his own country of the condition of affairs that such a possibility as a war sprung suddenly upon the people would be rendered almost an impossibility; and how should you undertake to gauge such services as have been rendered the people of this country in the past, such services as may well be rendered them again, such services the possibility of which we shall always create if we have lying back of our appropriation bills the proper tone of the public service, and the proper tone of administration? Without those two you may put your public offices up to auction——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair interrupts the Senator to inform him that his time has expired. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations embraced between lines 39 and 46.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KELLY. Upon this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. MITCHELL.] If he were present he would vote for the amendment of the committee, and I should vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cooper, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, West, Windom, and Wright—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cockrell, Davis, Dennis, English, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Boutwell, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Johnston, Kelly, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, and Wadleigh—24.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 50, to increase the appropriation "for minister resident accredited to Guatemala, Costa Rica, Honduras, Salvador, and Nicaragua" from $6,500 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 50 the following clauses:

For minister resident at Uruguay, also accredited to Paraguay, $10,000.
For minister resident and consul-general to Hayti, $7,500.

Mr. BOGY. It seems to me, if I understand the amendment, it ought to be separated. The two clauses are not at all germane. I ask for a vote on the first clause.

Mr. SARGENT. Let the vote be taken on the first paragraph first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the first paragraph of the amendment as reported by the Clerk.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next question is upon the amendment embraced in lines 53 and 54, to insert:

For minister resident and consul-general to Hayti, $7,500.

Mr. DAVIS. That appears to be a new item. I ask the Senator having charge of the bill to explain it.

Mr. SARGENT. It is not a new item.

Mr. DAVIS. I say it appears so.

Mr. SARGENT. It has been in all the time, and there are reasons why it should be as recommended. Our business with Hayti is increasing and is very valuable, in that the exports from our country very largely prevail over the imports. It is a very valuable trade. Furthermore, on account of the revolutionary nature of the country, we ought to have some person present there with diplomatic functions, some person with discretion, more on account of the difficulties which our masters of vessels and sailors are liable to get into in such a country. The consul-general, a resident there with diplomatic functions, has been very useful in this particular. Of course we need somebody to guard our commerce. By the convention of Paris in 1854 no consul has any diplomatic functions whatever; all civilized nations have followed that convention. That is the universal rule, and consequently we need a minister resident or some person with diplomatic functions there who can approach the powers that be. This is minister resident and consul-general to Hayti, and he is recognized by this convention of all nations as having a right to lay before the authorities the demands of his own government or wrongs inflicted upon the people of the country which he represents.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the Senator if it is the same amount that has heretofore been given?

Mr. SARGENT. This is the amount that is now paid to this officer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 27, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cockrell, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Whyte, and Withers—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, English, Ferry, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Maxey, Mitchell, Patterson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Wallace—31.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in the item "for chargés d'affaires ad interim and diplomatic officers abroad," to increase in line 58 the appropriation from $20,000 to $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was in line 63, to strike out after the word "legation" the words "(when acting also as interpreter)" and in line 64 to strike out "three thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For salary of the secretary of legation at Japan, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was in line 73, to increase the appropriation for the salary of the secretary to the legation (when acting also as interpreter) at China," from $4,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was to strike out lines 77 to 80 inclusive, as follows:

To enable Robert C. Schenck, minister to Great Britain, to employ a private amanuensis, according to the joint resolution approved January 11, 1871, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 80:

For the interpreter to the legation at Japan, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was in line 84, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses of foreign intercourse proper, and of all the missions abroad," from $50,000 to $100,0000.

Mr. DAVIS. This is an amendment different probably from any we have had yet. There is no law, I believe, which will sustain a contingent fund of this character. I understand the amount proposed is not greater than has been allowed heretofore, but as the bill came to us it was put at $50,000. The Senate committee propose to strike out "50" and insert "100," making the contingent fund of the State Department for foreign intercourse $100,000. It is believed by some of us that the amount is too great. My object is only to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that this is one of a class of amendments which I believe have no law to sustain them, though a contingent fund has always been voted in the past.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it may be safely said, positively said, that it will be impossible for the Department to carry on its business with the amount allowed by the House; and it is also true that the amount reported by the Senate committee is less than it has ever been before; that is to say, it is less than the average of such allowances.

Mr. DAVIS. It is the same as last year.

Mr. SARGENT. This fund has been very economically administered. I am very well satisfied of that by personal examination. I do not think anybody doubts it. I need not go into a statement of what are contingent expenses, because they are very multifarious and absolutely necessary. I have here the different appropriations made away back to the administration of Pierce, the average per year, and I call attention to it to show that this bill is not extravagant. During Pierce's administration, from 1853 to 1857, the average amount was $109,810.67. The average per year during Mr. Buchanan's administration, from 1857 to 1861, was $120,336.95. The average per year during Lincoln's administration, from 1861 to 1865, was $132,283.75. I suppose the item was somewhat swelled then by the character of our affairs abroad at that time, although it is about $12,000 a year only above that of the preceding administration. The average expended per year during Johnson's administration, from 1865 to 1869, was $140,731.69. That is more than under any preceding administration. The average during General Grant's administration, from 1869 to 1873, was $109,759.91. That is less than under any other administration, unless it was before that of General Pierce; and I have no record prior to that. The average is but a little less than that under Pierce's administration. The bill with this amendment appropriates but $100,000, which is $9,000 less than the average under the present administration.

The Secretary of State has been extremely cautious in the expenditure of this fund. I think that he has been accused of meanness by the foreign ministers in his expenditure of this money, or rather on account of his saving spirit. I am told by those who have visited our legations abroad that their offices are very meanly furnished, frequently without carpets or with carpets worn out so as to be disgraceful, and that the commonest kind of furniture only is employed. The Secretary of State refuses to replace it, not having the means to replace it out of the appropriations which we have made. This is rather painful to state, but I am told it is so. Some members of the Committee on Appropriations who have been abroad inform me that out of this fund the Secretary of State cannot replenish these things. I think, at any rate, under the present circumstances we ought not to allow any more than is proposed in the committee's amendment. It was on an intelligent consideration of these circumstances, and not because there was any particular provision of law on the matter, that the Committee on Appropriations recommended that we appropriate the amount of last year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment in line 84.

Mr. COCKRELL. I would like to have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conkling, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, English, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, McMillan, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Withers—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Key, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, and Whyte—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Kelly, McDonald, Mitchell, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Wright—29.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 87, to increase the appropriation "for the agent and consul-general at Cairo" from $3,000 to $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 90, to increase the appropriation "for the consuls-general at London, Paris, Havana, and Rio de Janeiro, each," from $5,000 to $6,000, and to increase the total appropriation from $20,000 to $24,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 93, to increase the appropriation "for the consuls-general at Calcutta and Shanghai, each." from $4,500 to $5,000, and to increase the total appropriation from $9,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 96, to increase the appropriation "for the consul-general at Melbourne" from $4,000 to $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 97, to strike out "consul" and insert "consuls;" in lines 97, 98, and 99, to strike out the words "$3,500; for the consul-general at Berlin, $3,000; and for the consul-general at Montreal;" in line 100 to insert "Berlin, and Montreal, each;" and in the same line to strike out "10,500" and insert "12,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the consuls-general at Kanagawa, Berlin, and Montreal; each $4,000, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 102, to insert after the word "Rome" the word "and;" in line 103, after the word "Constantinople," to strike out the words "St. Petersburg, and Mexico;" and in the same line to strike out "2" and insert "3;" so as to make the clause read:

For the consuls-general at Vienna, Frankfort, Rome, and Constantinople, each $3,000, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 104 to insert:

For consuls-general at St. Petersburg and Mexico, each $2,000, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was in lines 109 and 110, to increase the appropriation for "the salaries of consuls, vice-consuls, commercial agents, and thirteen consular clerks" from $230,400 to "$332,200, namely."

Mr. SARGENT. That is a footing of what follows after.

Mr. COCKRELL. This general amendment includes the whole of the detailed amendments in the subsequent part of the bill?

Mr. SARGENT. This includes the whole in regard to consuls and consular salaries.

Mr. COCKRELL. Why not put them all together and take the yeas and nays on the whole question? That is what I was going to propose.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no objection to that. I ask that the items from line 108 to line 292 be taken as one amendment. That is what it really amounts to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be so understood, if there is no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. Except that I want to perfect the text a little. On page 6, lines 129 and 130, I move to strike out the words—

GREECE.

Athens.

I move that in addition to the amendments reported by the committee. I do it, however, on the order of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. On page 9, line 196, I move to strike out "Aix-la-Chapelle."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That amendment will also be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. The question may now be taken on the other amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments embraced between lines 108 and 292, inclusive.

Mr. COCKRELL. Upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, English, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Logan, McMillan, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Cockrell, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Kelly, McDonald, Mitchell, Patterson, Saulsbury, Stevenson, and Thurman—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 301, to insert after the word "Manchester" the word "Beirut;" in line 305, to strike out "2" and insert "5;" and at the end of the same line, to strike out "for clerk for the consul at St. John's, New Brunswick, $600 while the present incumbent holds the office, and no longer; 42,600;" and at the end of the paragraph, before the word "dollars," to insert "51,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the consul-general at Havana and the consul at Liverpool each a sum not exceeding the rate of $3,000 for any one year; and to the consuls-general at London, Paris, and Shanghai each a sum not exceeding the rate of $2,000 for any one year; to the consuls-general at Berlin, Vienna, Frankfort, and Montreal, and to the consuls at Hamburg, Bremen, Leipsic, Lyons, Manchester, Beirut, Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Chemnitz, Sheffield, Sonneberg, Dresden, Havre, Marseilles, Fayal, Nuremberg, Leith, Naples, Stuttgart, Mannheim, and Tunstall each a sum not exceeding $1,500 for any one year, $51,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 310, 311, 312, and 313, to strike out the words: "Namely: at Shanghai, 2,000; Tien-Tsin and Fowchow, 1,000 each; and at Kanagawa, 1,500; 5,500;" and to insert: "At Shanghai, Tien-Tsin, Fowchow, and Kanagawa, at $2,000 each, 8,000;" and in line 315 to strike out the word "dollars;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries of the interpreters to the consulates at Shanghai, Tien-Tsin, Fowchow, and Kanagawa, at $2,000 each, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued. The next amendment was in line 319, before the word "other," to insert the word "twelve;" and in line 321 to strike out "4,500" and insert "6,000;" so that the clause will read:

For salaries of the interpreters to twelve other consulates in China, Japan, and Siam, at $500 each, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 322, after the word "consular," to strike out the word "agents" and insert "officers;" and in line 323 to strike out "8" and insert "10;" so as to make the clause read:

For consular officers, not citizens of the United States, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was in line 330, to increase the appropriation "for loss by exchange on consular service," from $10,000 to $48,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 336, to increase the appropriation "for contingent expenses of United States consulates, such as stationery, book-cases, arms of the United States, seals, presses, and flags, rent, freight, postage, and other necessary miscellaneous matters, including loss by exchange," from $100,000 to $131,850.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the Senator from California explain the necessity for that increase. It is a mere question of discretion apparently on that item, and not following a law as to salary.

Mr. SARGENT. I will give an explanation. The amount which is appropriated is a little less than the amount heretofore appropriated, and is based on a careful estimate of the amount absolutely necessary and that experience has shown to be necessary. The reduction of the House is on the theory that a large number, some forty, consulates would be abolished, and consequently any incidental expenses in connection with them would be saved. We have restored the forty consulates, and the proportion in this bill should be maintained. Experience has shown that this amount is absolutely necessary. I have some memoranda from the Secretary of State bearing on that matter which can be read, if desired; but I have stated the result of my study of the matter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 340, to strike out "4,500" and to insert "5,000;" in line 341, to strike out "4,500" and to insert "5,000;" in line 343, after the word "dollars" to insert "for contingent expenses, $700;" in line 344, after the word "of" to strike out "10,002" and to insert "11,009;" so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and expenses of the United States and Spanish claims commission, namely: For commissioner, $5,000; for counsel, $5,000; for secretary, $912.50; for messenger, $300; for contingent expenses, $700; making, in all, the sum of $11,912.50.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 347, to insert after the words "convicts in" the words "Siam and;" and in line 349, after the word "exchange," to strike out "1,600" and insert "4,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For rent of prisons for American convicts in Siam and Turkey, and for wages of keepers of the same, including loss by exchange, $4,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 351, to increase the appropriation "for rent of prison for American convicts in China" from $1,300 to $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 353, to increase the appropriation "for wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses" from $8,000 to $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 355, to increase the appropriation "for rent of prison for American convicts in Japan" from $650 to $750.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 357, to increase the appropriation "for wages of keepers, care of offenders, and expenses" from $4,500 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after line 357:

For rent of court-house and jail, with grounds appurtenant, at Yeddo, or such other place as shall be designated, $3,850.

For rent of buildings for legation and other purposes at Peking, or such other place as shall be designated, $2,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 366, to increase the appropriation "for bringing home from foreign countries persons charged with crimes, and expenses incidental thereto, including loss by exchange" from $3,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 368, to increase the appropriation "for relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries" from $60,000 to $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 371, to increase the appropriation "for expenses of acknowledging the services of masters and crews of foreign vessels in rescuing American citizens from shipwreck" from $2,500 to $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded. The last amendment was to strike out lines 386 to 391, inclusive, in the following words:

And the salaries provided in this act for the officers aforesaid, respectively, shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1876; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed from and after said day.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments reported by the Committee on Appropriations have been disposed of. The bill is still open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. WITHERS. I indicated a purpose to move some amendments when the bill should come to be considered in the Senate; but, inasmuch as it is manifest, I think, that a committee of conference will be required upon the bill before it can be passed, at any rate it will be a useless consumption of time to urge amendments now. Therefore I decline to offer those which I had proposed to offer.

Mr. DAVIS. It will be recollected that I gave notice that I would probably desire to reserve the first amendment in relation to the salaries of the ministers to Germany and Russia; but believing that the Senate has determined that they shall remain as they are, and seeing, as my friend from Virginia suggests, that the bill must go to a committee of conference on account of the disagreement of the two Houses, I do not ask now to save it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 35, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cragin, Dawes, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, West, Windom, and Wright—35.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Davis, Dennis, English, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—17.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Bayard, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Eaton, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Maxey, Mitchell, Patterson, Saulsbury, Sharon, Thurman, and Wadleigh—21.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2140) establishing Cheboygan, in the State of Michigan, a port of delivery was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The bill (H. R. No. 2934) to provide for the expenses of admission of foreign goods to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

EULOGIES ON SENATOR O. S. FERRY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the House of Representatives is in line 12, before the name of "Henry Wilson," to insert "Andrew Johnson, and the portrait of;" so as to make the bill read:

That 12,000 copies of the eulogies delivered in the two Houses of Congress upon the late Orris S. Ferry, late United States Senator from Connecticut, be printed, 4,000 copies for the use of the Senate and 8,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives; and that the Secretary of the Treasury have printed the portrait of Mr. Ferry to accompany the same; and the amount necessary for the engraving and printing the portrait, and also the portrait of Andrew Johnson and the portrait of Henry Wilson, heretofore ordered, be, and the same is, appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. ANTHONY. I move that the Senate concur in that amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

Mr. MORTON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution for investigating the Mississippi election.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I do not desire at all to interfere with the order of business here. If the Senator proposes to call up the resolution to be further discussed this afternoon, I have no objection to its being taken up; but I trust he will not call it up with a view of acting upon it to-day.

Mr. MORTON. I shall not, of course, desire to prevent discussion, or interfere with the business of the Senate; but I desire to have it taken up; and, if it is not the pleasure of the Senate to go on with it, let it go over until to-morrow. I prefer having it disposed of now, if there is no objection; but if that cannot be, I want it to be the unfinished business for to-morrow. I ask the Senator from Delaware if there is objection to an understanding that it shall be disposed of to-morrow?

Mr. BAYARD. I have no objection to its being disposed of, subject, of course, to the ordinary and customary opportunity for discussion.

Mr. MORTON. I will then venture to ask the Senate to stand by the resolution to-morrow until it is disposed of. I desire now to have it taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MERRIMON.) The question is on taking up for consideration the resolution indicated by the Senator from Indiana.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution is before the Senate and will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The resolution, as modified, now reads:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi (in 1875) for members of Congress and State officers and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds committed upon and violence exercised toward the colored citizens of that State and the white citizens disposed to support their rights at the election, and especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting or compelled to vote, contrary to their wishes, for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise, as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, thus practically denied and violated, and that such intimidation has been since continued for the purpose of affecting future elections; and whereas the people of all the United States have an interest in and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of these allegations, and to inquire how far these constitutional rights have in the said election been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation, and to inquire and report to the Senate, before the end of the present session, whether any, and, if so, what, further legislation is necessary to secure to said colored citizens the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights; and that said committee be empowered to visit said States, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony on oath, and to use all necessary process for these purposes.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Before we proceed further with this matter, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business. That will leave this resolution in its proper condition as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 29, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ROUSE'S POINT, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a letter from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a report on the examination of Rouse's Point, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LOSS OF PUBLIC FUNDS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a letter of inquiry from the Committee on Military Affairs, a report on the loss of public funds by Lieutenant Joseph F. Irons, First Artillery, at Fort Adam, Rhode Island, in 1844; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADAM H. HERR.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, in response to a House resolution of the 18th instant calling for copies of papers in the case of Adam H. Herr, of Harper's Ferry, West Virginia; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

A. S. SHOTWELL.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with a request from the Committee on War Claims, copies of papers relating to the claim of A. S. Shotwell, arising from an award of the Cairo commission in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on War Claims.

DELEGATES FROM TERRITORIES.

Mr. RANDALL. I am directed by the Committee on Rules to submit the following privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the one hundred and sixty-second rule be amended so as to read as follows:

The Speaker shall appoint from among the Delegates from the Territories one additional member of the Committee on the Territories, one additional member of the Committee on Indian Affairs, one additional member of the Committee on Mines and Mining, and one additional member of the Committee on Public Lands, and shall appoint the Delegate from the District of Columbia an additional member of the Committee for the District of Columbia; but the said Delegates, in their respective committees, shall have the same privileges only as in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a member of the Committee on Territories selected from the number of Delegates representing the Territories upon this floor. We propose to allow an additional member, to be selected from the territorial Delegates, for three other committees; that is to say, for the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the Committee on Public Lands. The reason for this recommendation on the part of the Committee on Rules must be manifest to the House. The Delegates from the Territories of course are perfectly cognizant of the local interests of their several Territories, and it is desirable the knowledge they possess should be available for the use of these committees at all times; and to accomplish that purpose we provide for an additional member to be selected from the territorial Delegates for the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Committee on Mines and Mining, and the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. STEVENSON. What necessity is there for any reference in the rules to a Delegate from the District of Columbia, as none is provided for by law?

Mr. RANDALL. For myself I am willing to consent to have that portion of the rule stricken out altogether. In this regard I notice I have the assent of two members of the Committee on Rules. We found it in the rules which were changed some years ago, when the District of Columbia had a Delegate upon this floor under the law. As there is no Delegate from the District of Columbia, there is great propriety in striking out that part of the bill, and I will so modify the report.

Mr. WILLARD. Let it stand as it is, because in the future the District of Columbia may have a Delegate, as I think it ought to have.

Mr. RANDALL. We can then alter the rule.

Mr. COX. One word; this may seem like an innovation, but I will say, Mr. Speaker, that many years ago, when Missouri was a Territory, the Delegate from that Territory was assigned a position on the Committee on Territories. Two years ago, when a Delegate was allowed upon this floor from the District of Columbia, he was assigned as an additional member of the Committee for the District of Columbia, and an additional member was allowed to the Committee on Territories, to be selected from the territorial Delegates. What is recommended by the Committee on Rules is in the same line of procedure and has equal reason with what has already been done.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. RANDALL. I am instructed unanimously by the Committee on Appropriations to report a bill to provide for the expenses of admission of foreign goods to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

The bill (H. R. No. 2934) was received and read a first and second time.

The bill appropriates $40,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of examination and appraisement and for the incidental expenses connected with the admission of foreign goods to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia.

Mr. RANDALL. This report comes from the Committee on Appropriations without a dissenting voice. It relates to the centennial exhibition, but in an entirely different direction from any former questions that have come before Congress. It is for the purpose of protecting the revenue. Originally the collector of the port of Philadelphia made a demand for $190,000 for the protection of the revenue in connection with the advent of foreign goods to the exhibition. The committee deemed that to be too large an amount, and asked the Secretary of the Treasury his views on the subject. The Secretary then said that he believed $88,000 would be sufficient, but at his own suggestion, and in the line of the wish of the committee, he sent a special agent to Philadelphia, who has returned and has reported to the effect that $40,000 will be adequate. This is for the payment of twenty examiners for a period of two months, of ten for a period of six months, and of one hundred and fifty openers, packers, and laborers.

Now, in connection with this subject, I will make a statement of this fact, that it is estimated that, by reason of these foreign goods coming into this exposition, there will be an increase to the revenues of the Government of $500,000; that is to say, the estimates of the Department and of others who are conversant with the subject go to establish the fact that the owners of these goods—which come in free of duty, it is true, for the purposes of the exposition—rather than send them back to the countries whence they come, will pay the duties respectively provided for by law on such goods, and sell them in this country. The amount that will thus be received has been estimated by those who are sanguine on this subject as high as a million of dollars; but I think it can safely be put down at a half million; so that this $40,000 of expenditure now goes ultimately to secure to the Government that large sum of money.

Mr. BANKS. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me, I desire to make a remark on this question, from which it may appear that a much less sum than that which is stated in this bill—which I think ought to be voted—will be necessarily expended. It is understood that there is quite an important reduction imposed and ordered of officers in the principal custom-houses for reasons that the Secretary of the Treasury comprehends better than we do. Now if any of those officers that are suspended could be employed for this duty, or in case they are actually suspended and other persons employed in their places, the pay that will be appropriated for the compensation of those officers will be deducted to a considerable extent from the appropriations already made or that are to be made; so that in that case a considerably less sum will be actually expended if we pass this bill than is embraced in the bill itself.

Mr. RANDALL. The Secretary of the Treasury did not feel that he had the warrant of law to expend any money, even though he had had the money in the Treasury for this purpose. But, as I understand, he did not have the money at his disposal. Therefore this appropriation became absolutely essential to the protection of the revenues in connection with this centennial exposition.

The gentleman from Massachusetts touches a little further upon the reduction which has been made by the voluntary act of the Secretary of the Treasury in the various custom-houses of the country for some period back; mostly, however, I think, in December last. Is that the point to which the gentleman alludes?

Mr. BANKS. No, sir; it is to take effect in the future, either now or hereafter.

Mr. RANDALL. In all the custom-houses of the country the Secretary of the Treasury in December last—in all the more important custom-houses—made a large reduction, both as to salaries and the numerical force. This was done in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, New Orleans, Baltimore, Charleston, and perhaps elsewhere. Now, that has no connection whatever with this subject. He made this reduction as to salaries; and, by the by, I may as well state here, as it comes in appropriately, that the Secretary of the Treasury in December last absolutely lowered such salaries of the various custom-house officers as he could lower, whose pay was not regulated absolutely by law; that he reduced their salaries from 20 to 25 per cent. throughout the country; and that in a year and a half, by this plan of reduction by the Secretary of the Treasury as to salaries of the officers, the expenditures of this Government in connection with the collection of the customs-revenue will be reduced a million and a half of dollars. And he ought to have the benefit of that statement. It is tardy it is true, but he ought to have the benefit of it. I have no doubt he took the hint from the fact that there was a democratic House of Representatives coming here. But we do not go quite so far. We have only proposed to reduce the salaries 10 per cent., while he has actually reduced them 20 to 25 per cent. We had not quite the nerve which the Secretary had.

Mr. BANKS. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] misapprehends the purpose of my remarks. My proposition was not in opposition to the bill, but in favor of it. It was that the reduction that is proposed in the expenses of the custom-houses now, by the Secretary of the Treasury, will leave the actual expenditures of the Government not much more than they are now if we pass this bill.

For example, I am informed that the collector of the port of Boston has reduced the expenditures of his office $156,000 in the last year. He is now expecting an order or has received an order to make a still further reduction of several thousand dollars; and, as I understand, the same rate of reduction has been made elsewhere. Now, if that reduction be made, and if the officers removed or suspended could be put on the duty suggested by this bill, there would be a considerable amount of money appropriated by the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania saved to the Government. If new officers are appointed to discharge these duties, and officers now employed in the custom-houses are suspended or removed, then the same amount now expended will be appropriated to the salaries of the new officers appointed; so that, in a word, there will not be a very large sum expended or appropriated beyond that now expended or appropriated if you pass this bill, and I think for that reason that the bill ought to pass.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill applies principally to the custom-house at Philadelphia. I have no objection that those officers who have been displaced at Philadelphia shall be re-instated for this purpose, if in his discretion the Secretary of the Treasury sees proper so to do. The reduction in Philadelphia since December last has been to the amount of $53,000, including the reduction in salaries and in the force employed.

Mr. BANKS. The Secretary of the Treasury may think it wise and expedient to employ men for this work who are the most skilled in this business and the most faithful officers in the employ of the Government, and in that case we shall have good services and not a much larger appropriation than is now required.

Mr. RANDALL. We must leave this matter to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, but I should be glad if the Secretary of the Treasury would read the views of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] before he comes to make his selection.

Mr. BANKS. He ought to do it.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations when we are going to get through with making appropriations for this Centennial?

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman had heard my opening remarks he would have seen that the Centennial has no interest in this matter; that this money is appropriated for the purpose of protecting the revenues of the Government; that this $40,000 will be applied absolutely to the protection of the Government against smuggling out of the exposition, which will save to the Government certainly not less than half a million of dollars.

The question was put upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time; and on a division there were ayes 98, noes not counted.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF WITNESSES BEFORE CONGRESS.

Mr. BANKS, from the Committee on the Rules, submitted the following report:

The Committee on the Rules, to which was referred a resolution concerning the pay of witnesses, report back the resolution with the following amendment:

Strike out the word "two," in the third line, and insert "three;" so that it will read as follows:

The rule for paying witnesses summoned to appear before this House, or either of its committees, shall be as follows: For each day a witness shall attend, the sum of $3; for each mile he shall travel in coming to or going from the place of examination, the sum of five cents each way; but nothing shall be paid for traveling when the witness has been summoned at the place of trial.

Mr. BANKS. This resolution was referred to the Committee on the Rules on motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] It is precisely the existing rule of the House now except as to the per diem. A witness is now paid $4 a day. There is another department of the Government where the pay of witnesses is but $2 a day, and the proposition of the resolution referred to the committee by the gentleman from Indiana was that the House should pay $2 per day instead of $4. The committee, upon full consideration of the question and by a unanimous vote, instructed me to report this amendment, providing that the per diem of witnesses before the House or its committees shall be $3 instead of $4, as now allowed, and instead of $2 as proposed by the gentleman from Indiana; and we do it upon this principle: that witnesses are servants of the Government; they come to us with information necessary to us in the discharge of our business. They ought to be paid a reasonable compensation, not enough to induce men to come here for the purpose, but sufficient to induce them to come when their attendance is absolutely necessary.

Now, we thought that $4 a day was too much, inasmuch as another department of the Government pays but $2 per diem; we thought, on the other hand, that $2 a day was too little, and that $3 a day would be a fair compensation.

The resolution does not change the rule of the House in any other regard. The amount allowed for travel to and fro is precisely the same. I will call the previous question and then yield to the gentleman from Indiana for a few moments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts be entitled to any time after the previous question is called, this not being a bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from a committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed that it was only on reporting a bill that a gentleman was entitled to time after the previous question was seconded.

Mr. BANKS. I will yield to the gentleman now before calling the previous question.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts states that $2 a day is the sum provided as witness fees established by the rules of another branch of the Government, to wit, the other branch of Congress. Ought not the statement be broader than that, that $2 a day is the amount allowed witnesses by every other department of the Government except the House of Representatives?

That is the law as to witnesses attending the Federal courts here at the capital and elsewhere; and it is also the rule of the Senate of the United States. I submit to the gentleman from Massachusetts that the rule should be uniform, that there is no reason why a witness should receive a higher compensation for attending upon the committees of this House than upon the Federal courts or upon a committee of the other branch of Congress. I do not see why there should be the difference proposed by this amendment to the rules. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will consent to an amendment so as to make the allowance to witnesses before the committees of the House of Representatives correspond to what in all other instances is the rule in regard to witness fees. I do not think the House should allow this discrimination in favor of its witnesses.

I understand that there are now here a large number of witnesses who are pressing claims for attendance to the amount of $80 and $100 each, arising, perhaps, in part from their not being in a hurry to be examined on account of these high rates of compensation. This compensation of $3 a day for witnesses is more than is allowed elsewhere. It certainly would make it proper that we should revise the laws in regard to witness fees in our Federal courts, for it is no more oppressive to a citizen to answer to such a demand as this made upon his time and services by a committee of the House of Representatives than it is to go elsewhere in the public service for the purpose of giving testimony.

I trust the gentleman from Massachusetts will permit a motion to amend. If he had simply reported back the proposed rule as referred to the committee with an amendment, which is the usual practice, and it seems to me the proper one, then the House could vote upon the amendment. As it is now, I suppose the only mode of getting the two-dollar proposition before the House would be by a motion to amend the report to that effect. I hope the gentleman will give me an opportunity to move such an amendment.

Mr. BANKS. In reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] I would say simply that in the first place, in regard to the courts, every witness there is subpœnaed and compelled to attend. The great majority of witnesses that come before the committees of the House of Representatives come upon invitation or voluntarily, it may be, for the public interest. They are the servants of the Government. As a House invested with the power of impeachment and inquiry, we could not get along without this information, and we ought to pay witnesses at least a sufficient sum to meet their ordinary expenses, so far as not to interest them to absent themselves from attendance here.

In regard to the amount allowed by other departments of the Government, permit me to say that this House being that branch of the Government invested with the power of impeachment and general inquest, the number of witnesses called before us must be greater than the number who appear before any other branch of the Government. It therefore becomes a very important matter that these witnesses should be willing to come when they are wanted. If we are compelled to subpœna our witnesses, to send an officer of the House for them, the cost to us will be much more than it will be if we can get them upon invitation, or to appear voluntarily with the information which they have. It would be much better to pay them a reasonable sum than to reduce their compensation much below their necessary expenses.

The Committee on the Rules were unanimously of the opinion that $3 a day was a fair compensation; while $4 a day might be considered a little too much, $3 a day could not be so considered, and $2 a day would be too small a sum to be just under the circumstances.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask this question? Was not the allowance for witness fees here $2 a day until the year 1872; and was it not then increased from two to four dollars a day? Was not that the fact? I think it was.

Mr. BANKS. It is very likely that a change was made some years ago to $4 a day; we propose to reduce it to $3.

Mr. HOLMAN. There was no embarrassment in obtaining the attendance of witnesses here when the compensation was $2 per day.

Mr. BANKS. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] who desires to make an inquiry.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether witnesses are paid in the other departments of the Government a per diem for the time they occupy in coming here and also for the time they are in attendance?

Mr. BANKS. My understanding of the practice here and elsewhere is that witnesses are paid a per diem for their actual attendance only; that for the time they are traveling to and from the place of their residence they are paid five cents per mile each way. The Committee on the Rules understand distinctly that such is to be the practice here; that the proposed per diem is to be for actual attendance and the five cents per mile each way for the time they occupy in traveling is to be for their traveling expenses. I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the Committee on the Rules was adopted.

Mr. BANKS moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REDEMPTION OF UNUSED STAMPS.

Mr. THOMAS, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps.

The bill repeals the fourteenth section of the act passed February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal revenue laws, and for other purposes," and provides that all unused stamps shall be redeemed when properly presented, as was done prior to the passage of said act.

The amendment reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was to add to the bill the following:

Provided, That from and after the passage of this act no allowance shall be made for documentary stamps (except those of the denomination of two cents) which, when presented to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, are not found to be in the same condition as when issued by the Internal-Revenue Department, or, if so required by the said Commissioner, when the person presenting the same cannot satisfactorily trace the history thereof from their issue to their presentation as aforesaid.

The question was upon the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. It will be perceived that this bill proposes to repeal the fourteenth section of the act of February 8, 1875, entitled "An act to amend existing customs and internal-revenue laws, and for other purposes." That section fixes the 1st day of October, 1875, as the limit of the period within which internal-revenue documentary stamps shall be redeemed. That period has expired, leaving still outstanding and unredeemed a considerable amount of these stamps. This bill, as now amended, provides that under suitable regulations all unused stamps shall be redeemed when properly presented, as was done prior to the act of 1875. This bill has been submitted to the Treasury Department, where this amendment was prepared. The bill and amendment have therefore the approval of that Department.

The amendment reported by the committee was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THOMAS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the following distribution shall be made of the reports of the United States geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, published in accordance with acts approved June 23, 1874, and February 15, 1875, as the several volumes are issued from the Government Printing Office, to wit, nine hundred and fifty copies of each to the House of Representatives, two hundred and fifty copies of each to the Senate, and eight hundred copies of each to the War Department for its uses.

JUDGMENTS OF GENEVA AWARD COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of paying the judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress," is hereby authorized to convert into coupon bonds, and to sell, after five days' notice, so many as may be necessary for this purpose of the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States now held subject to the disposition of Congress under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1873, chapter 261.

SEC. 2. That so much of section 15 of the act approved June 23, 1874, chapter 459, as conflicts with this act is hereby repealed.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, by an act passed at the present session of Congress, and approved on the 15th of February last, the court of commissioners of Alabama claims were required to report forthwith to the Secretary of State the amount of judgments rendered by that court pursuant to section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the Forty-third Congress. The Secretary of State was required to transmit a copy of that report to the Secretary of the Treasury, who was directed, without unnecessary delay, to proceed in accordance with the provisions of that chapter to pay the judgments therein specified.

The act of March 3, 1873, required that the amount awarded by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, amounting to $15,500,000, should be invested in 5 per cent. bonds of the funded loans of 1881, authorized to be issued under the acts of 1870 and 1871, which bonds should be held by the Secretary of State in trust for the payment of the judgments in favor of the parties who should thereafter prove up their claims against the fund. Those bonds now held in trust amount with the interest to $17,439,000.

Pursuant to an act passed at this session of Congress, the court of commissioners have made a report to the Secretary of State, who has transmitted a copy to the Secretary of the Treasury, stating as the amount of judgments $6,476,532.96. This is the amount proved up which the Secretary is required to pay. By an act approved June 23, 1874, the Secretary of the Treasury was authorized and required to pay these judgments out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and for that purpose he was authorized to sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, at not less than par in coin, a sufficient amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he might prescribe, of denominations of $50, or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest payable quarterly in such coin at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The House will perceive that the act of March 3, 1873, required the amount of the award to be invested in 5 per cent. bonds and held subject to the disposition of Congress. The act of June 23, 1874, authorized and directed the Secretary of the Treasury to issue certain bonds for the purpose of paying that award. He has not been authorized to dispose of or sell the bonds, which are now held by the Secretary of State in trust for this fund. The bill now reported proposes simply that in lieu of the Secretary of the Treasury issuing and selling the bonds mentioned in the act of June 23, 1874, he shall sell the bonds held by the Secretary of State. To issue the bonds provided for in the act of 1874 would require plates to be executed. The expense of printing and issuing the bonds would amount to $15,000 or $20,000. That we regard as an unnecessary expense, to obviate which the bill provides that the Secretary of the Treasury may sell at public sale the bonds already held, which constitute a part of the funded loan of 1781 and are now outstanding.

It has been suggested, why not pay these judgments out of the funds in the Treasury, and apply these bonds upon the sinking fund? The objection to that is that it is better for the United States to apply the sinking fund to reduce the debt bearing the largest rate of interest, to reduce the 6 per cent. debt rather than the 5 per cent. debt. Those 5 per cent. bonds, I will say, bring now, as I noticed by a late dispatch, 5 per cent. premium in coin in Europe; they are above par to that extent.

I therefore, unless some gentleman is desirous to say something in regard to the subject, will demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I hope this will not be pressed to a vote now, but go over so we may have time fully to consider it.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The importance of the present consideration of the bill is this: Under an act passed by this Congress with the approval of the President a little more than a month ago the Secretary of the Treasury is required to pay judgments under the Geneva award at once, and I can see no objection.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman demand the previous question?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do demand the previous question, unless some gentleman desires to be heard in explanation.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I wish to have the matter further considered. I am in favor of paying this debt, but not of selling bonds to pay it. We can arrange to pay without any sale of bonds. In my judgment there is no necessity calling for any sale of bonds to pay this small debt.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The Secretary has power to issue new bonds to pay it. This provides only for the disposition of bonds already held by the Secretary of State.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether this Geneva award fund is not now invested in registered bonds? The law in force authorizes the issue of coupon bonds to pay these judgments, which will result in the transfer of registered bonds to that extent. The effect of this is, instead of authorizing the conversion of those registered bonds into coupon bonds, to sell them.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I have a statement from the Treasury Department which I did not have read as I did not wish unnecessarily to occupy the attention of the House, but I will, with the permission of the House, insert it in my remarks. I will explain, as I have already, that the object of the bill is to avoid the necessity of issuing the class of bonds authorized by the act of 1874, which will require an expense of fifteen or twenty thousand dollars to engrave, print, and issue them. The Secretary of the Treasury is authorized by that act to issue certain bonds to pay those judgments, but he is not authorized to dispose of bonds in trust for this fund. He is required by the act passed at this session of Congress to pay those judgments. To do that he must issue new bonds, as the law now stands. This bill authorizes him to sell bonds already issued and now held by the Secretary of State in trust to pay these judgments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I supposed that was the object of the bill.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays on the engrossment and third reading of the bill, and will call them upon the passage of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman one more question, whether this provides for 5 or 6 per cent. bonds?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The bonds authorized to be sold are 5 per cent. bonds. There are no 6 per cent. bonds of the funded loan of 1881.

Mr. HOLMAN. The law now in force authorizes the issue and sale of 5 and 4½ per cent. bonds.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The act of 1874 authorizes the Secretary to issue 5 per cent. bonds. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill. The statement from the Treasury Department, to which I have called attention, is as follows:

The act of March 3, 1873, (17 Statutes, 601) provides that immediately after the payment of the sum of money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva, to be paid by the government of Great Britian, the same shall be paid into the Treasury, and used to redeem, so far as it may be, the public debt of the United States, and the amount equal to the debt so redeemed shall be invested in the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States, to be held subject to the future disposition of Congress.

In accordance with the terms of this act, the money received into the Treasury from the government of Great Britain was used in redemption of the 6 per cent. bonds of the United States, and an amount equal thereto was invested in the 5 per cent. registered bonds known as the "funded loan of 1881," which are held by the Secretary of State as trustee of the fund.

It will be observed that this act required that an amount equal to the debt redeemed should be invested in the 5 per cent. registered bonds of the United States. The only loan that the Government was then issuing was what is known as the funded loan of 1881, authorized by the act of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, for the purpose of funding the debt at a lower rate of interest; and therefore the investment was to be made in these bonds, there being no other in which it could then have been made. Under the construction given to the law at the time, the transaction became a part of the funding operations.

Section 15, act of June 22, 1874, (18 statutes, 248,) requires the Secretary of the Treasury to pay the said respective payments of said court out of any money in the Treasury, and for that purpose he is authorized, when necessary, to issue and sell at public sale, after ten days' notice of the time and place of sale, at not less than par in coin, a sufficient amount of coupon or registered bonds of the United States, in such form as he may prescribe, of denominations of $50 or some multiple of that sum, redeemable in coin of the present standard value, at the pleasure of the United States, after ten years from the date of their issue, and bearing interest, payable quarterly in such coin, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum. And upon the payment from time to time of the said respective judgments of said court as before provided, the bonds of the United States mentioned in the act approved March 3, 1873, entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award * * * shall be canceled and extinguished to the amount of such payments, and, when all such payments shall have been made any such bonds remaining shall also be canceled.

This section, although in the description of the bonds to be issued is a paraphrase of the act of July 14, 1870, is held by the proper law officer of the Department to require the issue of a new loan; the bonds authorized to be issued by it being for the payment of the judgments of the said court, and not redeemable until after ten years from the date of their issue.

The object of the proposed bill is to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to sell the bonds, or others of the same loan, of which he has a large amount unissued, in which the fund is already invested, and to avoid the expenses and difficulties to be encountered in issuing an entirely new loan. The cost of engraving, preparing plate, printing, &c., of the bonds for a new loan would not cost less than from $15,000 to $20,000. Besides this, the bonds in which the fund is invested are already a part of the $500,000,000 of the funded loan. If a new loan were issued, the amount of this loan would be reduced by the amount of the new loan, its series would be interrupted, and its unity destroyed.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Is it in order to move to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER. It is not, as the main question has been ordered.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Is it in order to lay the bill upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Then I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was passed.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour now begins at ten minutes after one o'clock p. m. The call of committees for bills of a public nature rests with the Committee on Military Affairs, and there comes over from the last morning hour a report from that committee, which is the first question in order.

PAY AND ALLOWANCES OF UNITED STATES ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. BANNING. I have the floor.

The SPEAKER. The chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, during the last morning hour, reported from that committee, as a substitute for House bill No. 1806, a bill (H. R. No. 2817) to regulate the pay and allowances for forage and quarters of Army officers, on which the gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the members of the House I will say that this is a House bill. As printed, it is numbered 1806 on the Calendar, but it will be found as amended and now reported to the House by the committee in the RECORD of March 24, page 21.

This bill fixes the salaries and allowances of Army officers. The necessity for stopping every waste of the public money is so great and well understood that I will not detain the House in repeating the argument. The salaries reduced by this bill are what may be termed war salaries, salaries fixed during and since the war, when the currency of the country was much less valuable than now, when the products of the farm and shop were more expensive, when larger salaries were required for the support and maintenance of officers' families.

Mr. Speaker, twenty years ago offices were sought after, both because the positions were honorable and the salary sufficient. The cost of living then was about the same as now, the salaries paid much less than now and less than the salaries provided for in this bill. An examination of the prices of flour, beef, pork, corn, beans, butter, coal, sugar, salt, potatoes, and other articles of like character, will show that they can be purchased cheaper at this time than they could be purchased in 1855, while staple cotton and woolen goods are 10 per cent. cheaper than in 1855. It is estimated that a family can be clothed, housed, and fed now on as small a sum of money as at any time within thirty years. Good carpenters accept work readily at $1.50 a day. The average expense of supporting a family is estimated at less now than it was before the war. Labor is being employed in Pennsylvania for ninety cents a day.

Sir, never was it harder to pay taxes than now, never could deserving men be found in greater numbers to perform official duties on smaller salaries than now.

In 1860 we had as officers of our Army one major-general, who was a Lieutenant-General by brevet; three brigadier-generals of the line and one of the staff—making five general officers in all—whose aggregate pay and allowances amounted to $38,799.48. Now we have one General, one Lieutenant-General, three major-generals, six brigadier-generals of the line and seven of the staff—making eighteen in all—whose aggregate pay and allowances amount to $160,926.48; being an increase of four to one in numbers and more than fourfold in amount of annual pay.

The question, however, is, are the salaries provided for in this bill a sufficient compensation for the services performed by these officers?

I know it will be claimed in opposition to the passage of this bill that many of the men whose salaries will be reduced were distinguished soldiers in the war of the rebellion, and that the country owes them a debt of gratitude; all of which is true. But, sir, the country can never pay the debt of gratitude it owes the soldiers of the Army in dollars and cents. Nor, sir, is it just or right to select out of the many distinguished soldiers of our Army eighteen officers, and, in addition to increasing their rank to that of General, Lieutenant-General, major-general, and brigadier-general, to pay them $162,926.48 per annum for their services, while such men as Stanley, Hazen, Davis, and other distinguished soldiers, who were brigadier-generals and major-generals during the war are now reduced to captains, majors, lieutenant-colonels, and colonels in both rank and pay. I say, in answer to this argument, it is due to other distinguished soldiers of the Army who won in battle and received as evidences of their valor the highest commissions of our service, who are now humbly and faithfully performing their duty in a reduced rank, that the pay of those whose peers they were in war should not be so large as to make the comparison invidious.

Sir, there is, however, nothing in the argument. The debt of gratitude we owe the soldiers cannot be paid in money. The soldier did not fight for money, but for the Government of his fathers. Thanks be to his courage, we are here as Representatives of the people of the "United States," not to perpetuate the hatreds of the past, but to forgive and forget; to look forward, not backward. Not for the glory and grandeur of any one or any set of men, but for "the greatest good to the greatest number."

A distinguished soldier when asked if a reduction in our Army expenditures is necessary, how and where it should be made, said: "If you must reduce, then cut off at the head and not at the foot." The bill now under consideration is framed in accordance with this advice. The bill reduces the pay of all general officers, of all second lieutenants for their first four years' service, and the allowances of all Army officers. It prevents any officer detached upon the staff of the General or Lieutenant-General receiving any rank or allowances more than those belonging to the next grade above that of his actual rank in the Army, and prevents in the future the shameful practice of detailing a young second lieutenant, just from West Point, who has seen no service, and promoting him over the heads of old veterans to a lieutenant-colonelcy, upon a general officer's staff. It repeals the law authorizing extra lieutenants as adjutants and quartermasters, assigning these officers to the first vacancies that occur in their grades. It provides that chaplains hereafter appointed shall only be appointed for four years, subject to re-appointment and confirmation by the Senate.

In details the bill makes changes and reductions in salaries as follows:

First. It reduces the pay and allowances of the General of the Army from $18,081.91 to $10,000, thus saving to the Government $8,081.91. I do not think it is necessary for me to stop to argue the propriety of this reduction or the sufficiency of the remaining salary of $10,000. It is double that of a Senator, 25 per cent. more than that of a Cabinet officer or a supreme judge, and as much as a proper performance of our duties will admit of our giving the distinguished commander of our armies.

Second. The bill reduces the pay and allowances of the Lieutenant-General from $13,593.86 to $8,000 a year, saving $5,593.86; leaving the Lieutenant-General a salary which is 60 per cent. more than the salary of a Senator, being a salary for life, equal to that of a Cabinet officer. The bill reduces the pay and allowances of a major-general from $10,093 to $6,000, saving on the pay of three major-generals $12,281.56; leaving the annual pay of the major-general $1,000 more than the pay of a Senator, which is an ample compensation for these officers.

Fourth. This bill reduces the pay of the brigadier-general from $7,613.00 to $5,000 per annum, saving on the pay of thirteen brigadier-generals $33,169.13; leaving the pay of each the same as the pay of a Senator; making a saving on the general officers' pay of $60,000.46 annually.

The pay proper of the colonel, lieutenant-colonel, major, captain, and first lieutenants is not changed. These are the hard-working officers of the Army, many of them having been general officers in the war; men who led their commands in action, whose long and faithful service entitles them to the highest consideration, whose pay proper is not too large, and, in the opinion of the committee, should not be reduced.

The bill reduces the pay and allowances of all second lieutenants $200 per annum for the first four years of their service, fixing the salary at $1,200 not mounted, and $1,300 mounted. This amount is, in the opinion of the committee, a fair compensation for young, inexperienced officers of this grade. The amount is sufficient for their support, and the testimony of experienced soldiers is that small salaries are best for young officers who know but little of the real value of money. It teaches them to avoid extravagance and practice economy. This pay is more than the average earnings of young men just starting in civil life. It is estimated that this reduction will make a saving of $25,000 per annum.

Sixth. The chaplains' pay is reduced from $1,500 per annum to $1,200 per annum. This will make a saving of $10,200.

Seventh. The repeal of the statute authorizing regimental adjutants and quartermasters to be extra lieutenants is recommended by many experienced officers of the Army and by the Secretary of War. It is a reduction of eighty officers, who, as extra adjutants and quartermasters, are not needed, and is a saving of $121,700 annually.

Eighth. The reduction of the rent of officers' quarters from $18 per room per month to $12 per month, it is estimated by the Quartermasters' Department, will save $107,839.30 annually, and leave allowances to officers for quarters as follows: To a colonel, $60 per month when on detail; to a lieutenant-colonel, $48 per month; to a captain, $36; and a lieutenant, $24.

Ninth. The estimated saving in fuel is $5,996.16 per annum. The reduction of the number of horses allowed officers, and preventing officers drawing forage for any horses except such as are actually owned, kept, and used in the service, it is estimated will make a saving in forage of $140,000. Add to these items the savings made in reduction in amount of transportation, pay, and allowances of extra lieutenants as adjutants and quartermasters of staff-officers, and it will be found that the passage of the bill will save more than $500,000 annually. This is a saving which in the opinion of the committee should be made. After all the reductions I have named are made, the officers whose salaries are reduced will be amply, well, and generously provided for.

In conclusion, I beg leave to submit a table, prepared at the Paymaster-General's Office, showing the exact pay and allowances of the general officers of our Army; that eighteen officers of high rank receive $160,726.48 per annum. Of this amount, more than $31,000 is paid to two officers whose rank did not exist in our Army before the war; more than $53,000 is paid to seven brigadier-generals of the staff, of whom we had but one before the war; showing that while our Army is less than double the strength in enlisted men to what it was before the war, the number of general officers is almost four times as many now as then, and their salaries more than four times as much now as then.

I wish now to call the attention of the House to the fact that our Army expenditures are growing each year, in the matter of fuel and quarters furnished officers, as is thus stated by the Quartermaster's Department:

	1874.	1875.
Fuel	$369,222 00	$393,836 80
Quarters	258,635 41	278,782 52

I wish also to state as a reason for reduction and retrenchment in Army matters, that from a table furnished me by the Pay Department, I find that notwithstanding the reduction of the Army from thirty to twenty-five thousand men, for some reason not explained, the cost of paying our Army grows upon us at the rate of more than $500,000 a year. The Army Paymaster-General's statement which I ask may be printed as a part of my remarks shows that the disbursements chargeable to the fiscal year 1872 were $10,683,181.60; for 1873, $11,188,556.70; for 1874, $11,797,810.78; for 1875, $12,171,130.92; while a reference to the Secretary's letter of estimated appropriations for next fiscal year shows for pay of Army, as follows:

General and staff officers	$1,054,100 00
Corps of Engineers	281,476 00
Ordnance Department	274,828 00
Signal Corps	81,620 00
Ten regiments of cavalry	2,194,160 00
Five regiments of artillery	911,040 00
Twenty-five regiments of infantry	$3,614,948 00
Indian scouts	46,800 00
Miscellaneous	4,381,316 50
Total	12,840,288 50

Making an anticipated increase in the pay of the Army for next year of more than $600,000 over the pay of the Army in 1875. Thus we find that while all values are shrinking, our Army expenses are growing at the rate of about a half million of dollars annually. I will, Mr. Speaker, have more to say upon this subject at another time.

I hope the House will take the statements I have made into consideration, and find in them and our depressed financial condition reasons sufficient for the support and passage of this bill.

NOTES.—Prior to the fiscal year 1871 the disbursements for items 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 were made by the Quartermaster-General's Department.

Included in the disbursements for 1871 is the amount (one year's pay and allowances) paid to officers leaving the Army under act of July 15, 1870.

The amounts stated as disbursements chargeable to fiscal year 1875 under items 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6 are for eleven and a half months' service. One-half month's pay, say $500,000, is due and not paid, owing to a deficiency in the amount appropriated for the service of said year. The disbursements in 1875 under item 11 are not "mileage," but "actual traveling expenses" of officers, exclusive of amounts paid by the Quartermaster's Department on transportation orders, which form an item of these expenses.

FEBRUARY 29, 1876.

BENJ. ALVORD,
Paymaster-General United States Army.

I do not know how much time gentlemen will wish to use in argument, but I am willing to yield to any one who wishes to speak for or against the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. What is the total amount of reduction?

Mr. BANNING. About $530,000.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will yield a moment, I wish to say, while I have had no time to study the bill, that just before one of his colleagues on the Committee on Military Affairs [Mr. HURLBUT] left the House last night he put into my hand a copy of the testimony taken before the committee, stating that he might not be here this morning, and asking me to have a paragraph read for the information of the House. I ask the Clerk to read from page 18 the marked passage. It appears that the committee took the testimony of Major-General Hancock, among many others, in reference to the proposed reduction of pay, whether in his judgment the pay of the Army could fairly and reasonably be reduced.

The Clerk read as follows:

In adopting the military profession the officer relinquishes some of the dearest rights and privileges of the citizen; he subjects himself to a new and stringent code of laws; he submits to constant and irksome restrictions upon his freedom of speech and liberty of person; his movements are entirely dependent on the will of others. These are no trifling sacrifices, yet the officer makes them willingly in the interest of the service with which he has identified himself. What he asks in return is security of place and pay so long as he is worthy, and that he may not after all his sacrifices, his years of faithful service, his increased experience, be told that he is overpaid now because the proportion between his pay and his services to-day is not the same as it was when he was last exposing his life for the nation. And while he has a right to demand this security, it is also, in my opinion, to the great interest of the Government to confirm him in the possession of it, for whatever tends to impair it has a directly injurious and ultimately ruinous effect upon the efficiency of the Army. For these reasons I think that no reduction can be made in pay and allowances of officers of the Army without serious detriment to the efficiency of the service.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, this testimony of Major-General Hancock is very weighty, and ought to challenge the serious consideration of the House.

I do not now discuss the general bearings of this bill, for I have not been able to study it. It is unfortunate that many members of the Military Committee are absent. But I want to say that if there be any part of the service of the United States which can be looked upon with satisfaction it is our military and naval service. We have rarely known in this country any officer to dishonor those branches of the service. Hardly ever has there been a case of peculation on the part of officers of the Army and Navy; and largely because men are not there subject very much to the contingencies of political life and to the changes of political parties. For that reason they choose their profession for life; not as we do our places here, with such uncertainty of our tenure of office. But there a man deliberately enters upon a career which in a few years unfits him for any other thing. A man who has been twenty years in the Army or Navy, unless, perhaps, in the Engineer Corps, is almost entirely unfitted for any other business; and if we do anything in the way of legislation to render the tenure of an Army officer more uncertain and his emoluments fluctuating, we impair the spirit of the Army and very seriously disturb what is now so admirable in it.

I remember well that a few years ago, when we were compelled to cut down the Army, when we found that we had a greater Army than the necessities of peace required, Congress came to the conclusion that we ought not under any circumstances to dismiss a body of officers by the operation of law, but that by a process of absorption, not filling vacancies, we should make the reduction, so as not to take away any officer's commission that had been given to him on the faith of the Government.

In 1872, only four years ago, we passed the Army pay bill, which is the law as it now stands. At that time the pay and allowances of officers were made up by a series of complicated calculations; and it was difficult to say directly, by appealing to the statutes, what the pay of a captain, a major, or general might be. By that act we cut off nearly all the allowances the constructive charges, and all that went to make up the annoyances and vexations of that system of payment, and established a plain, direct salary. This was a little larger than the actual salary proper under the old law; but it was very little, if any, larger than the salary and allowances under the old law. As the law now stands, the Army officers are receiving salaries not differing much from what they have received for the last twenty-five years; and it seems to me that after only four years of trial of the new law we should not cut down the aggregate pay of Army officers half a million, and thus disturb their confidence in the good faith of their Government.

The views of General Hancock in relation to this bill are correct, that we should not disturb the stability which ought to exist in our Army by so severe a reduction. This question ought not to be one of partisan politics, but should be determined on the solid grounds of the public good. Who has asked for this legislation? What complaint has been laid before this House in reference to the pay of the Army? I have seen none. This is a gratuitous movement, uncalled for by the people, and likely to be considered as a hostile blow at a worthy class of public servants. This country owes a debt of gratitude to the Army and Navy, and will not be likely to forget this unsolicited attempt to injure the efficiency of establishments which have done so much to preserve and honor the nation. I shall vote against the bill.

Mr. BANNING. If any other gentleman desires to speak I am ready to yield to him. If not, I shall call for a vote. But before doing so I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

This reduction is made in accordance with the advice of General Sherman, who has said, "If you are going to reduce, cut off at the head, and not at the foot." We cut down the salaries of general officers. We would not expect them to say, "Cut down our pay." But we have allowed the General $10,000, the Lieutenant-General $8,000, the major-generals $6,000, the brigadier-generals $5,000; and we save $60,000 by that reduction. I do not think that my colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] would vote against that reduction. It is certainly a fair and just one. The other reduction made in officers' pay is the reduction of the pay of second lieutenant for his first four years' service; and old officers say to us that this is a proper reduction to make. I ask for a vote on the bill.

The question being taken on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time, there were—ayes 98, noes not counted.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. Why should the bill not fix the date when it will take effect—say the end of the current fiscal year?

Mr. BANNING. The bill as it stands would take effect on its passage; but I have no objection to its being provided that it shall take effect on the 1st day of July next.

Mr. GARFIELD. That would be better for the sake of the accounts.

Mr. BANNING. I have no objection; but I cannot move that amendment, because I am not authorized to do so by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the gentleman will allow me, I will move as an additional section the following:

That this act shall take effect from and after the 1st of July next.

Mr. BANNING. That may be agreed to by unanimous consent.

There was no objection, and the section proposed by Mr. GARFIELD was added to the bill.

Mr. FORT. Is this substitute printed?

Mr. BANNING. The substitute was printed in the RECORD of Friday morning last.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I now call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 139, nays 70, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Baker, Banning, Bell, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Mackey, MacDougall, McDill, Meade, Miller, Mills, O'Neill, Packer, Powell, Purman, Rainey, John Robbins, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, Schleicher, Schumaker, Sheakley, Sinnickson, William E. Smith, Southard, Swann, Thomas, Thornburgh, Charles C. B. Walker, John W. Wallace, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Charles G. Williams, Wilshire, and Benjamin Wilson—80.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The Clerk will suspend the roll-call until order is restored in the House.

Mr. FORT. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Nothing is in order except the roll-call, and the House must be in order, as the Clerks cannot hear the responses of members.

Mr. FORT. The disorder is occasioned by the fact that the bill has never been read, and members are endeavoring to find out what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late to raise that point now, and the Clerk informs the Chair that the bill has been read.

Mr. FORT. It was read on Friday last, but it has not been read to-day, and has not been printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is too late; nothing is in order but the continuation of the roll-call.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. HARTZELL, is detained at his room by indisposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. ROBBINS, is absent on account of the indisposition of his wife; if here, I take it, he would vote "ay."

Mr. ATKINS. My colleague, Mr. HOUSE, is absent on account of indisposition in his family, and has been for a day or two past; if present I expect he would vote "ay."

Mr. POWELL. I desire to state that I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ROSS; if he were here I think he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. EGBERT. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALLACE, of Pennsylvania. I do not know how he would vote, but if I had voted I should have voted "ay."

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. My colleague, Mr. MACKEY, is confined to his room by sickness, as I am informed.

Mr. POPPLETON. My colleague, Mr. COWAN, is absent at his home by leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to state that he has a letter from Judge LAWRENCE, of Ohio, stating that he is detained at home by indisposition in his family.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend the title of the bill so as to read as follows:

A bill to punish the Army of the United States for the gallant service rendered by it in preserving the Union.

Mr. BANNING. I would like to hear that amendment again read.

The Clerk again read the amendment.

Mr. BANNING. I move that it be referred to the gentleman from Iowa for the gallant services he rendered during the war.

Mr. KASSON. I am ready to report immediately.

Mr. BANNING. You are a great deal more ready to report now than you were to carry a knapsack during the war; you could not be found then.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the yeas and nays on agreeing to this amendment to the title.

Mr. PAGE. That is right.

Mr. BANNING. Is that amendment in order? I did not yield the floor for any amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman is too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is made too late.

Mr. RANDALL. The country will appreciate all this at its true value.

Mr. BANNING. Then I hope we will have the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the question now before the House.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BANNING. The first question, I suppose, is on my motion to refer this amendment to the title to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. PAGE. That motion is not in order.

Mr. BANNING. I call the previous question on my motion to refer.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that motion will prevail, for it would carry the bill with it, and I should be delighted to report upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will rule that the motion to refer the amendment to the title is not in order; for, if agreed to, it would carry the bill and everything with it.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 152, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, George A. Bagley, Ballou, Blair, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cason, Caswell, Conger, Danford, Denison, Dobbins, Dunnell, Eames, Fort, Foster, Frye, Hale, Hathorn, Hendee, Hoar, Hoskins, Hubbell, Hunter, Hyman, Joyce, Kasson, Kelley, Kimball, Lapham, Leavenworth, Lynch, Magoon, McCrary, Monroe, Nash, Norton, Oliver, Packer, Page, William A. Phillips, Plaisted, Platt, Rusk, Sampson, Sinnickson, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Van Vorhes, Alexander S. Wallace, Walls, Wheeler, Whiting, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., and Woodburn—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Baker, Banning, Bell, Blackburn, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Hamilton, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Haymond, Henkle, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, Hooker, Hopkins, Hunton, Hurd, Jenks, Thomas L. Jones, Kehr, Knott, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Levy, Lewis, Lord, Luttrell, Lynde, Maish, McFarland, Meade, Metcalfe, Milliken, Money, Morgan, Morrison, Mutchler, Neal, New, O'Brien, Odell, Parsons, Payne, Phelps, John F. Philips, Piper, Poppleton, Potter, Powell, Randall, Rea, Reagan, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Roberts, Robinson, Miles Ross, Savage, Sayler, Scales, Seelye, Sheakley, Singleton, Slemons, Southard, Sparks, Springer, Stenger, Stevenson, Stone, Tarbox, Teese, Terry, Thompson, Thomas, Throckmorton, Tucker, Turney, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Warren, Erastus Wells, White, Whitthorne, Wike, Alpheus S. Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, William B. Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Fernando Wood, Woodworth, Yeates, and Young—152.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ainsworth, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Banks, Barnum, Bass, Beebe, Blaine, Bland, Bliss, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Cannon, Chapin, Chittenden, Cowan, Crapo, Crounse, Darrall, Davy, Egbert, Ellis, Farwell, Faulkner, Freeman, Frost, Garfield, Gause, Haralson, Benjamin W. Harris, Hartridge, Hartzell, Hatcher, Hays, Henderson, Hoge, House, Hurlbut, Frank Jones, Ketchum, King, Lamar, Lane, Lawrence, Edmund W. M. Mackey, L. A. Mackey, MacDougall, McDill, McMahon, Miller, Mills, Morey, O'Neill, Pierce, Pratt, Purman, Rainey, John Robbins, Sobieski Ross, Schleicher, Schumaker, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Strait, Stowell, Swann, Thornburgh, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, John W. Wallace, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Willard, and Benjamin Wilson—78.

So the amendment to the title was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. EGBERT said: I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WALLACE; if voting I would vote "no."

Mr. BANNING. I call the previous question on agreeing to the title of this bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the title was agreed to.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STAFF DEPARTMENTS OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2264, a bill (H. R. No. 2935) to promote the efficiency of the Army, to provide for its gradual reduction, to consolidate certain of its staff departments, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for two weeks from Wednesday next at two o'clock.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. RANDALL. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. RANDALL. Then I call up the unfinished business, being the further consideration of House bill No. 2450, to provide for the deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States instead of fractional currency. Under the order of the House, the question will be taken upon the amendments in their order, the first question being upon the amendment of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. FRYE. There is a special order assigned for to-day, the Geneva award bill.

Mr. RANDALL. There are very strong reasons, which I think the gentleman will appreciate, why this bill should be disposed of as soon as possible. I would be content to have some other day assigned for the Geneva award bill.

Mr. FRYE. If a week from to-morrow can be assigned, it will be satisfactory to me, and I presume it will be to the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The postponement of the Geneva award bill does not necessarily cause it to lose its place, as it is made a special order from day to day until disposed of.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

An act (S. No. 614) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution and bills of the following titles:

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) for relief of Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein;

A bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2821) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill of the following title, with an amendment; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for the deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States instead of fractional currency.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I ask consent to move an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] so that it may be considered when that amendment shall be reached.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The order of the House was that the amendments should be considered in the order in which they relate to the bill.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I understand that, but I ask unanimous consent to move this amendment, which is very important should the bill pass.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Let the amendment be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] please state what he understands to be the order of the House in regard to this matter?

Mr. RANDALL. I understand that the amendment can come in by unanimous consent, and in no other way. I have no objection, however, to the amendment, if I understand what it is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment which the gentleman from Missouri desires to offer will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the first four lines of the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN the following words:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; but

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to considering this amendment?

Mr. OLIVER. I object.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman will not object. I simply ask a vote of the House on this proposition. It is a very important amendment. Without this or some similar amendment, the efficiency of the measure will be very much impaired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] insist on his objection?

Mr. OLIVER. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question will be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "redemption," in the seventh line of the second section:
And the Secretary of the Treasury shall continue such redemption of fractional currency by causing, under proper regulations, the coinage of not less than $1,000,000 each month and issuing the same until all the outstanding fractional currency be redeemed.

Mr. PAGE. I do not propose to discuss at all this amendment which I have offered. It proposes to make it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be coined $1,000,000 of silver coin per month and to issue it in place of fractional currency, until the whole amount shall be redeemed. It seems to me that this is an improvement upon the committee's bill from the fact that the bill does not, as this amendment does, make it mandatory upon the Secretary of the Treasury to go on and do this.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, I have had no opportunity heretofore to say anything upon this bill, and I do not propose now to say more than a word or two. I am certainly in favor of paying out the silver coin now in the Treasury; and when we shall have done that, it will then probably be time to determine whether any further issue of silver coin should be made, or whether fractional currency should be printed and issued.

As I understand, there is now about $45,000,000 of fractional currency afloat; some estimate the amount much lower by reason of the loss and destruction of this description of currency. Perhaps there is not over forty millions now in circulation. I understand that we have now in the Treasury about $16,000,000 of silver coin and considerable silver bullion, which is over one-third of the entire amount of fractional currency afloat. This silver coin is now ready for use as currency. The question, then, is whether we shall retain in the Treasury that $16,000,000 of silver now ready for use, and in lieu of it print for circulation $16,000,000 of fractional currency at a cost, as I understand, of about $400,000, and some estimate the cost at $500,000. The question is simply whether we shall expend about half a million dollars a year in printing fractional currency for circulation, or whether we shall pay out the silver we have on hand and save the amount annually. There can be no doubt about the economy of this measure. Fractional currency, it seems, is indeed very expensive. It costs about as much to print a ten-cent piece of fractional currency as it does to print a hundred-dollar bill; and this fractional currency, by reason of its peculiar use, is soon worn and mutilated and must be renewed at the cost of printing and counting.

So, as I understand it, if we print and issue $16,000,000 of fractional currency and keep the silver in our vaults, we shall probably have to reprint that fractional currency at a like cost within a year or so. If that be true, it seems to me clear that, having the silver ready for circulation, it is a matter of economy of about $500,000 year after year. The Government is not bound to recoin the silver at its own cost. When it is once coined and issued the Government responsibility is ended. The Government, as it will be remembered, is not bound to redeem its coin. It has been stated by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] that silver coin wastes by wear. That is no doubt true; but it would take many years to make a very perceptible difference in this silver coin; it certainly would not wear out in twelve or fifteen months or even in ten years. But even if it did wear, the loss by wear, as I understand, does not fall upon the Government.

The Government receives the silver in bullion at what it weighs, and will not be bound to recoin and make it full weight at its own loss and expense. If it be true that we have the silver on hand, no matter what it has cost to purchase it, and without any reference to return to specie payment, it seems to me to be a simple question of economy we should use the silver coin instead of printing paper fractional currency to circulate in its place.

Mr. KELLEY. As the gentleman from Illinois has referred to me, I desire to say I entirely agree with him in that view, and have so said. I would have that already coined paid out, and that the bullion on hand be coined and paid out, but I would not increase the gold-bearing indebtedness to buy more.

Mr. FORT. I am glad the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania agrees with me in that respect. The question whether we should sell bonds bearing gold interest for the purpose of purchasing silver to continue the resumption of fractional currency is perhaps another thing, which I have not time now to discuss. As far as I am concerned, I can see no other reasonable course for this House to pursue than to pass this bill, and put out this silver coin and save the printing of the currency. We ought to do it as a matter of economy, thereby saving half a million of dollars a year. And if the estimates of the cost of printing and reprinting every twelve to fifteen months this fractional currency are reliable, it will certainly be economy and in all respects better to procure the silver and coin it and redeem all of the remainder of this paper fractional currency.

Mr. PAGE'S amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred on the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, as follows:

Add to section 2:
Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint, to be formed into dollars, half dollars, quarters, and dimes at the standard value of such coin, paying the Government the cost of such coinage; and the mint at which such deposit of bullion may be made shall coin the same in the order of the delivery of said bullion at the mint.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, the amendment I propose is intended to restore the law in regard to coinage of silver as it existed in the Government from the establishment of the Mint until 1873. For about eighty years bullion, either gold or silver, has been permitted to be brought to the Mint to be coined. It seems to me the function of the Government is not, as contended by some gentlemen, to assume to fix the value of metal, or coin, or money, but, as has been stated by the gentleman from Massachusetts, to certify its weight and fineness. It is because an individual cannot be trusted with certifying the quality and weight of metal that it is confided to the Government, and the law has always recognized that, leaving the exchange value to be settled by the laws of trade. In 1873 a law, complained of I believe by those who are responsible for its introduction and passage through the House, changed the law in that respect.

That law, however, Mr. Speaker, permits foreign governments to do this very thing while it refuses it to citizens of the United States. We have a law which permits the Mint and branch mints of the United States, built by the money of the people of the United States merely for the purpose of establishing and certifying the weight and fineness of what is intended to circulate as money, to coin silver as well as gold for foreign nations, while at the same time it refuses this privilege to citizens of the United States. I find in the finance report for 1874 the Director of the Mint states that under the provisions of that act applications have been made and considered, and I believe we have actually coined money at our mints for foreign governments under the provisions of that law.

I know it may be said, at the rate at which silver bullion can be purchased, there is a profit to the Government in coining this bullion. If the Government of the United States will proceed to supply the people of the United States with silver coin to circulate in place of paper fractional currency, then I do not complain; but I do object to the United States occupying the position it now does of neither furnishing small silver change nor permitting the citizens of the United States to do so by having silver bullion coined at the mints. I have therefore moved this amendment. If other amendments proposed to the bill, directing the United States officers to proceed to purchase bullion and to coin it will furnish the amount, I shall not particularly care for the adoption of my amendment, although it seems to me that by so doing we will return to the old method by repeal of the law which has been in force only for two or three years.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, the objection to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois consists in this, that as the law stands to-day an ounce of silver is to be coined into a dollar and twenty-four cents and four mills, while an ounce of silver of the standard fineness may now be bought at a dollar and five cents. The amendment of the gentleman will thus give the depositor of silver at the Mint nineteen cents as profit which is now realized by the United States. In addition thereto, the law as it now stands restricts the issue of this debased coin to $50,000,000, while there is no restriction in the gentleman's amendment; and, if adopted, it will permit this depreciated currency to be inflicted upon the people to an indefinite amount.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague allow me to make a statement in confirmation of what he says?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. KELLEY. I was a member of the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures at the time of the modification of the law of which the gentleman from Illinois complains. The proposition to restore to the Government its seigniorage on subsidiary silver coinage was resisted. One witness appeared before the committee and was examined by the late Hon. Samuel Hooper, who was then my colleague on the committee, and myself. He admitted that his income was $100,000 a year from furnishing silver to be converted into subsidiary coinage. There is no nation in the world that allows its citizens to provide the metal for subsidiary coinage and take out the coin. All derive the means of maintaining their mints from the seigniorage. The British shillings are coined at a depreciation of 12 per cent. below the old standard price of silver.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I ask my colleague not to take the whole of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. I thought you had concluded.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I wish merely to say that the amendment as it stands of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will give to the owners of the silver mines of Nevada nineteen cents profit on every ounce of silver they send to the Mint.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I should like the gentleman's time extended for a moment that he may explain how this silver will be worth one hundred and twenty-four cents.

Mr. KELLEY. In coin value.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Not the coin value of the silver as in a coin.

Mr. KELLEY. Not the silver in the coin, but the face value of the coin.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. That is, if it were at the value of gold. But there is a limit; silver can be used only to the extent of $5 as a legal tender.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course the committee cannot agree to such a proposition as this of the gentleman from Illinois.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, it was not agreed to.

The next amendment in order was the one offered by Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, as follows:

In the tenth line, after the words "United States," strike out the balance of the section, and insert the following:

And the Secretary of the Treasury shall not be authorized to further increase the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York. I am opposed to the increase of bonds for the purchase of silver; for the reason that at present silver coins can be bought on the Pacific coast at 5 per cent. discount, and when a much larger amount is put into circulation we cannot tell at what rate of discount they will be sold. I am in favor of issuing what silver is now coined; also whatever bullion may be in the Treasury; but I am opposed to issuing any more bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage.

Mr. HALE. Before gentlemen take the responsibility of either voting against this bill, or, what is as bad, destroying its effect by amendments, it is worth while to consider that this is almost the first practicable and useful measure that has come before this House with any chance of passing. Upon the great question of the currency it is certainly the very first.

In the early part of the session, having the floor, I introduced a resolution looking toward making a resumption of specie payments effectual by putting more power into the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury. Upon that the previous question was voted down. Some weeks later the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. ATKINS] introduced a resolution upon a Monday morning wholly repealing the date of resumption fixed in the act of January, 1875; and upon that he barely divided the House. And on last Monday the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] bearing aloft the bill of the democratic caucus, sought a suspension of the rules, and gained a two-thirds vote, unluckily against the bill instead of for it.

Now to-day there is presented to the House, upon the question of our subsidiary coinage, an opportunity to give the people what almost every member about me upon this side and upon the other side, with the exception of my friend directly at my left, [Mr. KELLEY,] says he believes in—hard, good money. The position that confronts us is this: We have had nominally $45,000,000 of fractional currency; but the wear and tear of thirteen years have resulted in a loss to the people of, I venture to say, ten or twelve millions of dollars. That fractional currency has been constantly lessening at the cost of the people. There are not to-day, I believe, much more than thirty millions of fractional currency of the various denominations in the hands of the people. There is to-day, Mr. Speaker, in the hands of the Secretary of the Treasury coined money for the payment to the people of one-half the amount of all the fractional currency that is to-day out in the hands of the people; and the Secretary and the head of the Mint say that there can be more coined, as a matter of mechanical ingenuity and time, at the rate of $2,000,000 per month. So the opportunity is presented, with a fund on hand equal to 50 per cent. of the currency now out, of giving the people silver instead of paper. And yet gentlemen object, and amendments are offered here that kill the efficiency of this bill, like that to which we are now speaking.

Those who are opposed to the bill, and who want to kill it, and prevent us from giving the people silver instead of paper, realize that the money in the Treasury to the amount of half the extent of the fractional currency must be put out, or else its use must be lost, and it lies idle in the Treasury. But they say, as this amendment says, you shall go no further; and they take advantage of the attractive cry that the national debt shall not be increased in order to give more silver to the people. Why, sir, how could we have got that which is now in the Treasury except by purchase? And how can the Government pay its debt to the extent of these $45,000,000 of fractional currency with the silver now in the vaults of the Treasury? It can only be done by buying silver, and issuing it to the people.

The great objection, Mr. Speaker, or one great objection that is urged by timid men to the resumption of the greenbacks, is that it cannot be done; that there is but $13,000,000 of gold available in the Treasury for the purpose. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury had accumulated $175,000,000 of gold in the Treasury, half the amount of the greenbacks now out, would not the objections which many gentlemen urge to any process of specie resumption disappear?

We are in the condition, if you will not cripple the Secretary of the Treasury, to give to the people a currency that fire will not burn, that wind will not destroy, and that will not be depreciated and lessened in amount at the expense of the people, and a currency which I venture to say, if I know anything about the feelings of the people of the country, will be welcomed from north to south and from east to west, and I hope that gentlemen will not defeat the object of this bill by putting this amendment upon it.

Mr. KELLEY. I call for tellers upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. WILLIAMS.]

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE, and Mr. WILLIAMS of New York, were appointed.

Mr. RANDALL. This amendment is covered by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 90.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] that the real test on this bill is on the amendment of his colleague from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.]

Mr. KELLEY. A vote on this amendment is a good test on the measure to increase the gold-bearing indebtedness of the Government.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I must insist on the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment in order was the one offered by Mr. HEWITT, of New York; and was as follows:

Strike out all after the words "section 2" and insert the following:

That sections 1 and 2 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, are hereby repealed; and that the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to sell and dispose of so much of the silver bullion now accumulated in the Treasury as may not be required for the current operations of the Mint; but nothing herein contained shall be held to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from paying out the silver coins now on hand in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I have already, in the remarks which I submitted to the House when the bill was under main consideration, given my reasons for the amendment which I now offer, and I shall not take up the time of the House by repeating them; but, sir, I would like to say that the gentlemen who have done me the honor to undertake to reply to my remarks have fallen into two manifest errors.

The first is that I intended to make a partisan attack upon the republican party. I thought I made it plain by the very first phrase I uttered that I regarded these financial questions as entirely above party and beyond the reach of party tactics. I only made a résumé of what the republican party had attempted to do in order to enforce the moral upon those gentlemen as well as upon the gentlemen on this side of the House that any attempt to legislate upon great financial questions in caucus, as they did and as we have been trying to do, must from the nature of things be a failure. It was a failure in the case of the republican party and it has been a failure in the democratic party to attempt in caucus to adopt a system for the settlement of the financial questions which interest the whole country and all parties, and which demand for their solution the wisest counsels and the largest experience, wherever it may reside, inside of Congress or out of it.

These gentlemen utterly misapprehend my position. I did show that their hasty and ill-considered attempt had been a failure, and I quoted for it the evidence of their own Secretary of the Treasury; but I now repeat that there is no hope of any rescue from the difficulties under which the country is laboring, except through a union of all patriotic men on all sides, to take these financial questions out of the domain of partisan politics.

The second error into which these gentlemen fell was this: They quoted me as being opposed to the use of silver as a subsidiary currency. Mr. Speaker, it is not the material I am opposed to; on the contrary, in any well-regulated system of currency, silver must be used for subsidiary coin; it is the time when they propose to issue this silver that I object to. I repeat, now, that the time is most infelicitous, for the reason that silver is fluctuating in the markets of the world at a rate never before known in the history of the precious metals, and the very document which the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] quoted from the head of the French mint, in the letter of the Director of our Mint, showing that the Latin nations had combined together to restrict silver coinage, is evidence that it is no time for us to substitute silver, on which we must pay interest, for fractional currency, which can be produced for less than the interest.

What do these gentlemen propose we shall do? They propose what no merchant and no intelligent man would do, that we shall go out and buy an article in a falling market and which will fall still further; and they select this time because we happen to have $14,000,000 of silver in the Treasury. I say that I prefer to sell the bullion and the coin and buy back the interest-bearing bonds which have been issued for the purchase of this silver. But in deference to the opinions of many gentlemen about me, my amendment is drawn so as not to restrict the Secretary of the Treasury from paying out the $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 of silver which he has on hand if he chooses to do so. For one, however, I will never vote for a mandatory law which would compel him to pay it out, because I say that it would be increasing the burden of taxation on the people of the country which can be reduced by the sale of it, and because all the money invested in the purchase of silver is just so much taken away from our ability to resume specie payments.

Now, one other point. I propose by this amendment to repeal the first section of the resumption act, because it imposes an unnecessary burden of taxation, as I have shown. I propose also to repeal the second section, which provides for the free coinage of gold, for this reason: There is no country in the world that has a free coinage of gold. In England it is nominally free, but if you will turn to Jevons on Money and the Mechanism of Exchange, you will find that only once in the history of the British government has any private bullion ever been taken to the mint and coined free of charge. On the contrary, it all goes to the Bank of England, where it is subject to a charge of ½ of 1 per cent. We formerly charged ½ of 1 per cent., which we deliberately give up and put it in the pockets of the owners of the gold mines, taking $60,000 a year out of the pockets of the taxpayers of this country. I am not willing to continue any such provision of law—which is in fact an abuse of legislation—one moment longer than may be necessary to effect its repeal.

Mr. RANDALL. I am opposed to this amendment because it inappropriately, if not improperly and needlessly, repeals the first and second sections of the resumption act. If that act is to be repealed in part or in whole, this is not the place to do it.

My second objection is that it proposes that the Secretary of the Treasury shall take a step backward and sell what silver bullion remains in the ownership of the Government, instead of proceeding to coin it as he has already done to the extent of $12,000,000. When we first discussed this question there was about $12,000,000 of silver coin on hand, and there is now enough of bullion on hand to make $4,000,000 more, or in the aggregate $16,000,000 of silver coin, which can now be issued.

The gentleman in the last clause of his amendment proposes, not to restrain the Secretary of the Treasury from putting into circulation that $16,000,000 of silver coin, but he wants him to stop there. The result of that would be that we would have out $16,000,000 of silver coin, and the balance of the necessary change-money of the country would be in paper, and the expense of printing paper currency would still be kept up.

As to this matter of the fluctuation in the price of silver, on Monday, when I addressed the House, I cited a table which showed that the average price of silver per ounce as compared with gold was less than the value of the greenback dollar by only about 2 per cent.; it varied up and down. I have no belief in the world but what the average price of silver will so remain, in view of its production, of its use by foreign governments, and of other circumstances, that we can successfully issue and keep silver coin in circulation along with the greenback, with equal purchasing power with the greenback, and for a limited amount with equal purchasing power with the five-dollar gold-piece.

Although I prefer the original bill, I vastly prefer the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to this proposition, because the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana has at least the merit of giving us a siver-coin circulation for change-money to the entire amount necessary for the wants of the people.

Mr. TUCKER. Is it in order to move an amendment to this amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the order of the House no further amendments are in order.

The question was then taken upon the amendment of Mr. HEWITT, of New York; and it was not agreed to.

The next amendment in order was the amendment of Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, to strike out section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to have all silver bullion on hand at the present time coined into silver coins of the denominations of ten, twenty-five, and fifty cent pieces, of standard value, and pay the same out, together with that already coined and in the Treasury, on any debts or demands against the United States in any way he may prescribe.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I am in favor of paying out the silver coin that we now have on hand; there is no good policy whatever in keeping that coin unemployed; but I am opposed to the retirement of the fractional currency, to taking the risk of being entirely without fractional currency. We can very well afford to put out this $16,000,000 of silver coin. There has been retired more than $40,000,000 of national-bank currency, and there is now room certainly for $16,000,000 of silver coin; and I am in favor of paying out the silver coin now on hand.

My proposition is simply to pay out the coin we now have on hand without retiring any portion of the fractional currency. I am not in favor of retiring the fractional currency until it is demonstrated that the silver coin will remain in the country. We can very easily adjust this matter. We can pay out, as is provided by my amendment, all the silver coin on hand. Should there be too much fractional currency with the silver coin, there is a mode of redemption provided by returning it to the Treasury and obtaining greenbacks. When it is found that there is an abundance of currency in silver, the fractional currency will find its way to the Treasury of the United States. In that way we will take no risk. There is now complaint all over the country of the lack of fractional currency, because the manufacture of it has been stopped for some time.

Again, it is argued that this issue of silver coin in place of fractional currency is a measure of economy because of the cheapness of minting silver coin compared with the manufacture of the paper currency. It has been estimated that the manufacture of paper currency costs us about 3½ per cent. to keep it in circulation. That 3½ per cent. goes to the laboring-people of the country. The silver coinage will cost 5 per cent., which will go to the capitalists of the country, or rather, in all probability, to foreign capitalists. Now will any gentleman argue this question on the score of economy, when one costs 3½ per cent. and the other 5 per cent.; when one goes to the support of the laborers of the country, the other to the support of the capitalists? Beyond question it is our interest to retain in circulation the fractional currency and at the same time pay out on the debts of the Government all the silver we have on hand. That is the effect of the amendment proposed by me, which I hope will be adopted.

Again, sir, the second section of this bill is practically identical with the first section of the resumption act; there is substantially no difference between them. I ask you, then, what risk you take if you vote down the second section of this bill? The resumption act, containing a provision covering precisely the same ground, continues in operation. Indeed, sir, I do not see but that the Secretary of the Treasury has now all the power to carry out the resumption act that he would have if this provision should be adopted and become a law.

The question of increasing the bonded debt of this country is one that deserves consideration; and let me say now that not one vote will I give in this House to increase that bonded indebtedness. There is no necessity for such increase. That debt is too large now, and ought to be reduced if possible; certainly not increased. I am in favor of retaining the fractional currency as it is, and paying out the silver coin on the indebtedness of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that, as this bill comes from the Committee on Appropriations, the first thing we are to look at is the purpose which the committee had in view, which simply has relation to the expenditures of the Government in furnishing the subsidiary currency. The next point to be considered is whether the bill has any bearing, and, if so, how much, upon the general question which we have before us, of approaching, by some means or other, the resumption of specie payments.

Now, I confess, for my part, that I think this bill has very little to do with the resumption question. It is simply a proposition to substitute for the fractional currency which we now have silver coin so far as the metal already coined and the bullion in the mint will enable us to make that substitution. In this, I think, we are trying an experiment. It is generally conceded by all writers and all thinkers upon the question of currency that the cheaper currency will drive out the better. But exactly what is meant by a "cheaper currency" may not have yet been fully tested. It is undoubtedly true that a clipped coin or a debased coin will drive out a sound coin. It is true that a paper currency which has inferior provision for its redemption will drive out a paper currency that has a better provision for its redemption and that excessive issues of paper will supplant coin as currency; but I am not aware that any experience has yet determined whether a paper currency having provision for its redemption which gives it a better market value, or a better selling price in gold, than silver coin bearing the mint stamp of the same sum as is promised by the paper will or will not drive out the silver currency, the latter having an intrinsic value and the paper currency having no intrinsic value, but deriving its value only from what people believe it to be worth, relying upon the promise which it contains. The scrip and silver may circulate together. The silver may disappear, or, on account of the higher selling price of greenbacks, the fractional currency may not be offered for redemption in silver coin.

That is the experiment and the only experiment we are trying in this bill. But we must give it a fair trial. It will not do to limit the amount of silver coinage to the precise amount that is now in the Mint. You must so arrange your statute that the public can see that if they desire to use this silver coinage, there will be as much of it as may be needed clear up to the whole amount of fractional currency. We want for this purpose a systematic bill.

The amendment before us proposes to do away with the redemption clause of the bill, and instead of that to coin and issue the bullion not yet coined and issue the coin already in the Treasury in payment of the debts of the United States. It is therefore in conflict with the whole theory of the bill. My view as to the proper legislation upon this matter is to take the bill as reported by the committee, and to add to it the section proposed by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] providing for further coinage upon the plan which had obtained in this country until the recent change in our coinage law. We abandoned that plan because it was supposed the Government could make more profit by buying the bullion and coining it itself than by coining the bullion for the owners of it. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana proposes that we shall go on coining under the old system. He also proposes to stop all further sale of bonds for the purpose of buying bullion. I think that the provision of the amendment with the restriction would not be sufficient to insure a fair trial of the experiment without adding the proviso of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] that if bullion should not be presented for coinage in sufficient quantity for the redemption of the fractional currency offered, the Secretary of the Treasury may purchase silver bullion for that purpose. With the addition of these two amendments, I think we shall by this bill enter upon this system in such a manner as to insure a fair trial of the experiment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the second section of the bill and insert in lieu thereof the following: That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $200,000, to provide for engraving, printing, and other expenses of making and issuing United States fractional currency of existing denominations.

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, this bill involves, in my opinion, more important propositions than it is generally supposed by members on this floor. My amendment proposes to appropriate for the expenses of engraving and printing fractional currency $200,000; $250,000 was estimated for by the Secretary of the Treasury. The work in the Printing Bureau has now been suspended for some six or seven weeks, and I supposed $50,000 less might leave enough for the necessities of the case. The expedient of rushing at this moment on a silver subsidiary coinage with 14½ per cent. between gold and legal-tender was one I thought this House would scarcely adopt. But whether it did or not, I deemed the appropriation here proposed necessary to be made in this bill.

The gentleman from Indiana has said this second section of the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is precisely the same as the first section of the so-called resumption act. There is a material difference. That resumption act authorized, and authorizes to-day, the Secretary of the Treasury to issue this silver coin when he deems it practicable. The refusal on the part of the Committee on Appropriations to report this deficiency makes it impossible for the Secretary of the Treasury not to issue this silver, whether he deems it practicable or not. It is obligatory, because the country is upon the verge of a famine for small change. You refuse him the means to print, and make it obligatory upon him to issue what in his judgment he has not deemed proper to issue up to this date, as it might lead to further complications and confusion of values.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have to-day at the head of the Treasury one of the most accomplished statesmen in the country, a man I venture to say who has, whether we estimate for judgment or integrity, the confidence of both sides of this House. He has been authorized for more than a year to issue this silver coinage, and in his discretion he has never deemed it practicable to do so. This House has refused to furnish the means to print fractional currency for which he has estimated in case he thinks it is not practicable for some time to come so to issue, or in case this silver coin should go out of the country one week after it was issued and leave us without change.

Now, this creates a demand for silver to manufacture into small currency. The silver is now 4½ per cent. below greenbacks, and I am astonished that a hard-money man like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TOWNSEND] should offer the remarkable amendment that he has providing for the conversion of silver coin into greenbacks. He has paid a compliment to what they call the "rag baby" from a remarkable source. To prevent silver from further depreciating he proposes to make it thus convertible into greenbacks; or, in other words, to attach our legal tender to this Nevada pewter to keep it up to par.

We propose in this bill simply to render it impossible that the Secretary of the Treasury shall maintain proper business facilities unless he at once issue this silver, even if he deems it disastrous to do so. He has full power under the law to-day to issue it; and there can be no difficulty unless he sees it will confuse values. We propose to render it impossible for him to do what so far in his judgment he has deemed it proper to do.

I wish to call attention to another fact. There is an amendment pending to which I have not had opportunity to speak, and that is to permit the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury to regulate the price of coin. That power is given by the Constitution to this House, and we are not authorized to delegate it to any one else. How will it look, if we should pass such an amendment, to see telegrams each morning that the Director of the Mint and the Secretary of the Treasury had fixed the value 2 per cent. to-day lower than yesterday or 2 per cent. to-morrow higher than it was the day before?

I ask this side of the House not to embarrass the Secretary of the Treasury by the grant of any such power. I ask both sides of the House not to confer such dangerous power upon any executive officer. The Secretary of the Treasury now under the law has the power to issue this silver coin. If he thinks it is best, let him issue it. There should be no prohibition by law to his issuing fractional currency. In my judgment the country will soon be thundering at our doors unless we do furnish the means to the Secretary of the Treasury to issue it, if he deems it best. In a week or more there may be a scarcity of change for business very embarrassing to the people.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I have very little to say to the direct purpose either of the amendment or of the bill; but I rise for the purpose of saying that I do hope the bill will be allowed to pass in some shape as speedily as possible. There are, more or less, sixteen hundred persons, many of them having families, who under the idea of employment from the Government have been brought together in the city of Washington; and it is well known to this House many of these persons are absolutely wanting the necessaries of life. If this work is to be done, it may as well be done speedily as at any other time. I believe it to be the common sense of the House that we have to make some appropriation to do some work; and if it be done, it may as well be done in such a way as to prevent the suffering which now exists as to be done at a distant day, when charity has exhausted itself in feeding those now under the necessity of being helped by their friends.

I do not believe the passage of this bill in one shape or another is to have a feather's weight in deciding the question of resumption. Whether we are to resume or not is to be decided upon other bills, upon other principles, and at another time.

The question recurred on the amendment of Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 25, noes 128.

So the amendment was rejected.

The question next recurred on the following amendment, by Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania.

At the end of the printed bill insert these words, namely:

Provided, That all such coins shall be exchangeable at par by the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries for United States notes in sums not less than $3, and shall be receivable for postage and revenue stamps, and for all dues to the United States except customs, in sums not over $5, and shall be redeemed on presentation at the Treasury of the United States in such sums and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe: Provided also, That the total issue of such coins shall not exceed, at their nominal value, the sum of $50,000,000.

Mr. REAGAN. Why is it, Mr. Speaker, the amendment I have offered has not been called up in its order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendments are being gone through with in their logical and parliamentary order.

Mr. REAGAN. The point I make is the amendments ought to be considered in the order they were offered.

Mr. RANDALL. In that event we will have the greatest embarrassment and confusion. The amendments can only be considered in their parliamentary order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I modify my amendment, as I believe I have the right to do, by striking out in the fifth line the words "except customs," and also the proviso in the ninth, tenth, and eleventh lines; so that it will read as follows:

At the end of the printed bill insert these words, namely:

Provided, That all such coins shall be exchangeable at par by the assistant treasurers and designated depositaries for United States notes in sums not less than $3, and shall be receivable for postage and revenue stamps, and for all dues to the United States, in sums not over $5, and shall be redeemed on presentation at the Treasury of the United States in such sums and under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

When the bill was up the other day for debate, I was about to explain this amendment when the hammer fell and precluded me from so doing. The object of it is to obviate the difficulties that were spoken of in the course of the debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is too much confusion in the Hall. The House will come to order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this interruption will not come out of my time.

The object of this amendment is to obviate the objections that were made to the bill by the gentleman from New York and my colleague from Pennsylvania. Their ideas seem to be that, inasmuch as two silver half dollars will not buy as much gold in the bullion market at present as two paper half dollars, somebody had to be robbed of two or three cents in the dollar and that the poor man would have to suffer. In view of the fact that the nation fixes its price upon the paper token and upon the silver token also, I did not think that this objection would be valid. But in order to obviate all difficulty upon that score I have offered an amendment which puts the silver token exactly upon a footing with the paper token. The paper token of the Government is now exchangeable at par by the Assistant Treasurer of the United States in sums not less than $3 and is also receivable for postage and revenue stamps and for all dues to the United States in sums not over $5. By the amendment I have placed the silver tokens exactly upon the same basis as the paper tokens in the respect mentioned, and it will not matter what may be the depreciation in the price of silver. Whether it goes down to $1.05 on the ounce or as low as fifty cents on the ounce, the silver tokens will have the same efficacy as the paper tokens of the country. Besides that the amount is limited to $50,000,000 by existing law, and the country will not be flooded with a depreciated currency.

The next point with regard to the bill is the economy of it. Now, the life of the fractional token is only about a year, and the whole amount of that currency is changed every year at a cost of about $1,410,000. There has been already a loss to the people of about $12,000,000 on the fractional currency, as stated by the Director of the Mint or some one of the officers of the Treasury, being on the average an expense to the people of a million more. The laborer loses all this. He has to submit to it because it comes directly out of his pocket, and it is a poor consolation to him to tell him that when he loses a portion of the wages of his labor it is a gain to the nation; for his share of the gain is so infinitesimally small that he does not appreciate it, and it amounts to nothing to him in the reduction of his taxes or in any other way,

Again, the silver coinage costs only about 1½ per cent., and will last from fifty to one hundred years in circulation without recoinage. Besides that, the silver token is indestructible; it outstands all the mutations of time. The fractional currency is continually subject to destruction. The mice or rats will get into the drawer of the laborer, where he has laid the fractional currency away for a future demand, and nibble it to pieces, as in the following case published in the Sun of this morning:

A RAT'S NEST MADE OF GREENBACKS.

While repairing an ice-box belonging to Mr. A. B. Downes, of Mulberry street, Newark, yesterday, the carpenter found a rat's nest made wholly of fractional currency, so mutilated as to be worthless. There was from one hundred to one hundred and fifty dollars in it. Mr. Downes used to place his money-drawer in the box for safe-keeping.

It may be washed to pulp in the pocket of his waistcoat when it goes into the wash-tub; it may be dropped out of his pocket when he takes anything out of it; but the silver currency is indestructible amid all mutations and events.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. My time is not up. There were two minutes lost when the Speaker was getting the House in order, and I claim two minutes more.

Several MEMBERS. Give them to him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will give them to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I do not ask it as a favor. I demand it as a right.

I was saying that this silver coinage is indestructible. It does not suffer by fire. It cannot be destroyed by the rats nor washed to pieces by the washerwoman. But it will stand through all time, and it does not lose more than 1 per cent. probably in fifty years of active circulation. Indeed there are silver coins in existence to-day which have been circulating, or at least have existed, from the time when Judas Iscariot sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver. And more than that, there are coins in the cabinets of the curious which are as old as the time of and of the same character with the four hundred shekels of silver current money of the merchant with which Abraham bought the cave in the field of Machpelah for a burying-place for his wife, Sarah.

In view, then, of the silver tokens being thus indestructible and of an intrinsic value which paper tokens have not, I think it would be bad policy to adhere to the fractional currency, which is being lost to the individuals of the nation at the rate of a million a year and replenished at the cost of nearly a million and a half, being more than the interest of any bonds that may be issued for the purchase of silver for coinage. On the contrary, we should have this silver currency which is so indestructible, and which will save vast sums to the laboring classes of the nation.

Mr. KELLEY. My reply to the strictures of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] the other day upon my reflections on the reports of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Director of the Mint is that I have here the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has found it decent and becoming to expurgate the report of the Director of the Mint of the very objectionable matter to which I took special exception. And I now say that those two official reports are calculated to mislead this House, are misleading it, and have misled my colleague who has just spoken. He spoke of the substitution of silver for our fractional currency as a measure of economy. It is economy with a vengeance! Forty millions of 5 per cent. bonds are to be the price of your silver; $2,000,000 annually in gold is the foundation item of the cost; and, as the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] said, not to be paid to the women who make our fractional currency and spend their earning among us, but to the Rothschilds, Barings, and other European bankers.

You start with a debit of $2,000,000 in gold on account of the cost of silver fractional currency, and the reports I have referred to do not tell you that you have already paid $750,000 in gold for the possession of the silver now in the Treasury and which the law empowers the Secretary of the Treasury to issue. We are not the executive power of the Government. We enacted the law and the Secretary has in compliance with its provisions provided millions of silver coin. Why does he not issue them? Are we to usurp his functions or assume his responsibility? Is not his discretion as sound as ours? Three and a half per cent. is the cost of maintaining the paper fractional currency. Five per cent. paid in gold largely to foreigners is the fundamental item of the cost of this silver currency.

The next illustration of the economy of the measure which I submit is that the mint law of England contains each year an item of £15,000 sterling to make good the wastage of her silver shillings and sixpences. We will require at least $75,000 a year to recoin and replace the worn coin made out of silver sent to the Mint by private individuals or purchased with gold-bearing bonds.

But my colleague's amendment ingeniously proposes to make this coin convertible into greenbacks without limitation. His amendment proposes that on presenting $3 of this coin you may get greenbacks for them, and if you present a thousand sums of $3 each in one day at each of the sub-treasuries they must be converted into greenbacks.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. That is the case now with the fractional currency.

Mr. KELLEY. No nation in the world ever permitted private individuals to furnish the material for its subsidiary coinage. Under a mistake in our law, or under a misinterpretation for a brief period, men, adroit men, managed to get their silver coined at our mints; and, as I have already informed the House, we found one man who on being examined by the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures admitted that his profit on this business was, year by year, $100,000 on the coin delivered to him by our mints from the silver he deposited there, and he was only one of many. The silver thus coined has all been shipped abroad.

Now for what is all this expenditure to be incurred? To incur the possibility that a day may come when the people will have no fractional currency. Should Germany remonetize silver, should the Latin coinage union, when they determine the amount that may be coined by each country next year, determine to allow a free coinage of silver, our silver may go up to such a price that every dollar and every dime of it will go abroad at a profit to the exporter and leave our people with no fractional currency. Now the Secretary of the Treasury has at his command twelve or thirteen millions of dollars in fractional silver. Let him go on and issue it to test the question. Meanwhile let us keep up the fractional paper currency and maintain enough of it to keep up the total amount of subsidiary currency needed, and if at the end of the year we find the silver still floating we can enlarge the amount if it shall then be deemed expedient.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania; and on a division there were ayes 37, noes not counted.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The next amendment was the one offered by Mr. DUNNELL, to strike out the second section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue silver coins of the United States of the denomination of ten, twenty, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, whether the same be now in the Treasury awaiting redemption or whether it may be presented for redemption; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, under regulations of the Treasury Department, provide for such redemption and issue by substitution at the regular subtreasuries and public depositories of the United States until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

Mr. DUNNELL. Since I offered this amendment I have very patiently listened for some convincing argument in favor of the passage of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment I offered it seems to me ought properly to be acted on before a vote is taken on the motion of the gentleman to strike out the section, because mine is an amendment to the second section of the bill.

Mr. DUNNELL. I submit the question to the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas proposes to add his amendment as an additional section to the bill. The amendment now pending is to section 2. The amendment of the gentleman from Texas will be reached next after this.

Mr. REAGAN. The point I wanted to make was this: that I propose to amend the portion of the bill near the second section. The motion of the gentleman from Minnesota is to strike out that section before the House has an opportunity to see whether it wishes to ingraft an amendment on it so as to strengthen the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that the proper order is to perfect the original bill, and the House is proceeding in that order. The gentleman from Minnesota will proceed.

Mr. DUNNELL. I had commenced my remarks by saying that up to the time that I offered this amendment I had listened very patiently to hear some good, substantial argument in favor of the passage of this bill. I had not heard one then, and I certainly have not heard any since that time. There ought in the passage of a bill of this magnitude to be some definite, certain, and good argument in support of it. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] a short time ago spoke of this as part of a system of resumption. Does any one suppose that the exchange of our fractional currency into silver will at all affect resumption?

Mr. HALE rose.

Mr. DUNNELL. I have no time to answer questions. I say that a measure of this sort ought to have some positive good in it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who has charge of this bill in the first instance announced that it was a bill of economy. The remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] just made completely wipe out the argument that there is any economy in this matter.

Now it has cost us but little more than one million of dollars a year to keep afloat the fractional currency of the country. It comes right home to me as a matter of figures. If it costs us but that amount to keep afloat the fractional currency, how is it a matter of economy to go into the market with money obtained from the sale of gold-bearing bonds to purchase the silver with which to supplant this fractional currency? It is not in the power of any man here to show that it will cost us less to buy silver than it will to print this fractional currency. What will we have gained then? We will have lost a half million by the operation. We will not only have done that, but we will have withdrawn the means of support from at least two thousand dependent women and children in this city by an act of pretended resumption. There is no economy in it.

Mr. KELLEY. And we appropriated $11,300,000 for the coinage of gold and silver between 1860 and 1875.

Mr. DUNNELL. I do not yield.

Mr. KELLEY. I have got in the statement without your yielding.

Mr. DUNNELL. As to this being an act of resumption, I have not heard a single argument to show how it comes about that this of itself is an act of resumption. This fractional currency is merely change; it does not enter into what we look upon as the circulating medium of the country. It is not made use of in the fulfillment of contracts. It does not enter into those great commercial transactions that usher in or hasten the resumption of specie payments. It is simply change; nothing else.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] also said that the people want this silver; let us give the silver to the people. Has there come up from the people a single request for silver as against fractional currency? No. The people of the country are satisfied with the fractional currency; they are pleased with it rather than the burdensome commodity of silver.

Now, one word more. I have alluded to the cost of this currency. There have been but two years out of seven when this fractional currency has cost us more than a million of dollars. We now propose to go into the market and buy silver. I agree with the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] that, with the lights now before me, I have arrived at this point: I will not vote to increase the gold-bearing debt of this country. If there is to-day a burden under which we groan, it is the national debt, the gold-bearing debt, the $100,000,000 annually paid for interest on this debt in gold, $65,000,000 of that gold going out of the country. Let us come in here with some more substantial measure, and not attempt in this à la Richardson style to bring about specie payments. This attempt thus to reach specie payments is unworthy of Congress.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] has talked economy here until he is well-nigh hoarse; and he says that it will cost $1,100,000 to print the fractional currency. The gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. HAMILTON,] upon the same committee, got it up to $1,400,000; and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] who spoke the other day, got it up, as he said, well-nigh to $2,000,000. Therefore I say that there has been a lack of argument, a lack of fact, and a lack of reason why we should pass this bill.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I do not know that in my present physical condition I can make myself understood, but having some views of my own upon this subject, I desire to say a few words upon the general question. I have heard no gentleman express the views that I hold with reference to resumption, so far as the fractional currency is concerned. Though I may fail to be understood, may fail in the necessary strength to give my views to the House, yet I cannot forego the opportunity to make the attempt.

I think there is a very general popular error upon one or two questions that should be considered in this discussion. I think it is a misapprehension to suppose that the present depressed value of silver is in consequence of its large production. The present temporary depreciation in the value of silver is generally attributed to the very large production of our own mines, when the fact is that the aggregate production of both gold and silver in the whole world has been largely on the decrease for the last five years. In the New York Bulletin of to-day I find the following table, furnished by the leading financial journal of the world, giving the aggregate production of gold and silver from 1852 to 1875, both inclusive:

The Paris Journal des Economistes, of March, publishes the following statement of the world's actual annual production of gold and silver since 1852:

Year.	Gold.	Silver.	Total gold and silver.
1852	$182,500,000	$40,500,000	$223,000,000
1853	155,000,000	40,500,000	195,500,000
1854	127,000,000	40,500,000	167,500,000
1855	135,000,000	40,500,000	175,500,000
1856	147,500,000	40,500,000	188,000,000
1857	133,000,000	40,500,000	173,500,000
1858	124,500,000	40,500,000	165,000,000
1859	124,500,000	40,500,000	165,000,000
1860	119,000,000	40,500,000	159,500,000
1861	114,000,000	42,500,000	156,500,000
1862	107,500,000	45,000,000	152,500,000
1863	107,000,000	49,000,000	156,000,000
1864	113,000,000	51,500,000	164,500,000
1865	120,000,000	52,000,000	172,000,000
1866	121,000,000	50,500,000	171,500,000
1867	116,000,000	54,000,000	170,000,000
1868	120,000,000	50,000,000	170,000,000
1869	121,000,000	47,500,000	168,500,000
1870	116,000,000	51,500,000	167,500,000
1871	116,500,000	61,000,000	177,500,000
1872	101,500,000	65,000,000	166,500,000
1873	103,500,000	70,000,000	173,500,000
1874	90,500,000	71,500,000	162,000,000
1875	97,500,000	62,000,000	159,500,000

This statement is acknowledged to be correct by the Journal des Economistes and by the London Daily News.

This table shows that there has been a very large decrease in the aggregate production of silver in the whole world. It is, therefore, a mistake to suppose that the present depressed market value of silver arises from overproduction. It arises from another cause—one which, in my judgment, should be considered with reference to a resumption of specie payments, so far as the subsidiary coinage in this country is concerned. That cause is the attempt of Germany and other European governments to demonetize silver entirely and to drive it out of circulation as money, making their metallic circulation exclusively of gold. Now, that has not yet been carried out practically. Those governments are now considering the policy, the propriety, the expediency of adopting that course; but they have reached no conclusion upon it. The mere fact, however, of the consideration of the subject has had the effect to depress the value of silver. But if those nations should conclude finally not to demonetize it, silver would immediately advance in value in this country; instead of being depreciated as now, it would resume its former value, going into general circulation.

I have never considered the resumption of silver coinage a practical proposition until we shall resume upon gold coinage. That part of the resumption act which gives the Secretary of the Treasury discretionary power to resume upon silver will never be executed until he resumes upon gold. Any attempt at partial resumption would, I think, be unfortunate, because silver could not be floated for any length of time in this country under existing circumstances.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL, there were—ayes 47, noes 108.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as section 3:

That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment; and silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask to modify my amendment by adding to it the following:

Except for customs due to the United States, which shall be paid in gold, and except in satisfaction of contracts now existing and payable in gold.

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a question of order. The amendment offered by me was offered as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN]—a substitute for it, as I understood. Both propositions relate to the same subject, but are manifestly inconsistent. If the amendment of the gentleman from Texas should be adopted, I do not see how the amendment offered by myself could be considered.

The SPEAKER, (Mr. KERR having resumed the chair.) If it appears upon the face of the amendment that it is offered as a substitute for another amendment, it should be so treated by the House; but if it does not so appear, then it should be treated as an independent amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. When I sent up my amendment, I stated that it was so offered.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust I shall have a vote on my proposition.

The SPEAKER. The Chair at this time will not rule on the point which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] raises, because the hour for the recess has arrived. The Chair desires to announce that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will preside at the evening session of this day.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill, as I understand, will come up immediately on the reassembling of the House.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

The hour of half past four o'clock having arrived, the House, pursuant to its order, took a recess until half past seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. COX, as Speaker pro tempore.

AMENDMENT OF REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. STONE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2936) to amend sections 4017, 4018, 4019, and 4020 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEGAL ADVERTISING IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. STEVENSON, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2937) to regulate the cost of legal advertising in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

ATLANTIC AND PACIFIC RAILROAD RESERVE.

Mr. LUTTRELL, by unanimous consent, (for Mr. WIGGINGTON, detained from the House by sickness,) presented a concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of California, relative to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad reserve; which was read as follows, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands:

Senate joint resolution relative to the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad reserve.

Whereas the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States, under date of April 22, 1872, instructed the register and receiver to withhold from pre-emption and sale all the odd-numbered sections within thirty miles on either side of the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad, as indicated on the map of the route of said road from San Francisco to Mission San Miguel, a copy of which accompanied his letter; and whereas in 1874 the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the United States sent another letter of instructions, and a copy of a map showing the line of said Atlantic and Pacific Railroad from Mission San Miguel to the southern boundary of the San Francisco land district, and directing the register and receiver to withhold from pre-emption and sale all the odd-numbered sections within thirty miles on either side of the line of said road as therein laid down, in both instances increasing the price of the even-numbered sections within twenty miles on either side of the line of said road to $2.50 per acre; and whereas, under the provisions of the act of Congress approved July 27, 1866, incorporating the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, said company was to build a road from Springfield, Missouri, by the most eligible route to the Pacific, and a grant was made along said route to the Pacific; and, whereas the line of said road as finally determined makes said road reach the Pacific at San Buenaventura, in the county of Ventura, and State of California, and any reservation for the benefit of said road from San Francisco to the southern boundary of the San Francisco land district is without authority of law, and in direct violation of the act under which said corporation was formed: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That our Senators in Congress be instructed and our Representatives requested to use every endeavor to have said withdrawal removed, and have all the lands embraced therein re-opened to pre-emption and sale, subject to the same laws and regulations as existed at the time said order of withdrawal was issued.

Resolved, That his excellency the governor be, and he is hereby, requested to transmit a copy of the preamble hereto and this resolution to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

JAMES A. JOHNSON,
President of the Senate.
G. J. CARPENTER,
Speaker of the Assembly.

(Indorsed:)
Senate joint resolution No. 13. Passed the senate February 17, A. D. 1876.
E. L. CRAWFORD,
Assistant Secretary of the Senate.
Passed the assembly March 11, A. D. 1876.
CHARLES W. O'NEIL,
Assistant Clerk of the Assembly.
This resolution was received by the governor this 15th day of March, 1876.
E. W. MASLIN,
Private Secretary of the Governor.
A true copy. Attest:
[SEAL.]
THOMAS BECK,
Secretary of State.

EQUALIZATON OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, the bill for the equalization of bounties, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, was made a special order for to-day. It not having been taken up for consideration, the committee now request that it be made a special order for Wednesday of next week.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. After the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection that order will be made.

Mr. FRYE. In relation to that agreement, I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] to the fact that the Judiciary Committee had assigned for to-day the bill distributing the balance of the Geneva award; and it has been arranged—partially at any rate—that that shall go over on account of the business of the Committee on Appropriations, and be assigned to Wednesday of next week. Cannot the gentleman name Thursday for his bill?

Mr. TERRY. Without consultation with the committee, I would not like to name any other day, because the day I have mentioned has been agreed upon by the committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that the prior assignment is the Geneva award bill; and when the matter comes up it will be for the House to determine which shall take priority.

Mr. FRYE. I will object to this assignment for the present.

Mr. TERRY. Does not that objection come too late?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] rose at the moment the Chair was making the announcement. Does he insist on his objection? The Chair will state that his bill takes priority.

Mr. FRYE. If the Geneva award bill takes priority, I have, of course, no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn; and Wednesday of next week is set for the consideration of the bill for the equalization of bounties.

EMMA MINE.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to present certain memorials, to have them printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

Memorial of John L. Vanderwater and 15 other citizens of Utah, representing that the reports of the investigation of Congress regarding the Emma mine mislead the public in respect to the mines of Utah, are most unjust to the Emma mine, showing the great value of that mine, and its loss through mismanagement; and Memorial of W. J. Montgomery and 67 other citizens of Utah, representing that the reports of the investigation of Congress regarding the Emma mine mislead the public in respect to the mines of Utah, and are most unjust to the Emma mine, showing the great value of that mine, and its loss through mismanagement.

Mr. EDEN. I object to the printing of these memorials in the RECORD.

Mr. PAGE. Does the gentleman object to the printing of these memorials in the RECORD and their reference to the appropriate committee?

Mr. EDEN. I have no objection to the introduction and reference of the memorials to the appropriate committee, but I do object to their being printed in the RECORD.

Mr. PAGE. I understand the gentleman to object to the printing of these memorials in the RECORD.

Mr. EDEN. I cannot see any good reason why they should be printed in the RECORD and made an exception to the rule in such cases.

The memorials were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

ALBERT V. CONWAY.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 93) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to issue duplicate bonds to Albert V. Conway in place of originals lost; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimates of appropriations required by the various Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876, and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

BALANCES REQUIRED TO BE RE-APPROPRIATED.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with section 5 of an act approved June 20, 1874, making appropriations for services of the Government, &c., a statement of certain balances carried to the surplus fund required to be appropriated for the fiscal year 1873 and prior years; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. ROBERTS for two days; to Mr. LAWRENCE for one week on account of the illness of his son; to Mr. METCALFE for five days from next Friday on account of pressing business; to Mr. HOLMAN for to-night on account of sickness.

NEWTON S. MURPHY.

Mr. CASWELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2938) for the relief of Newton S. Murphy; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SUBSTITUTION OF SILVER COINAGE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first thing in order this evening is the consideration of the unfinished business, being a bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

Mr. KELLEY. Am I wrong in thinking we are acting to-night under the special order that these evening meetings shall be devoted to the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill by name? I care nothing——

Mr. RANDALL. This is the unfinished business operating, as it were, under the previous question, and was so stated by the Speaker this afternoon before we took a recess.

Mr. KELLEY. It was so inferred. I want to avoid a dangerous precedent. I have no objection to the consideration of this bill; but, if the House by unanimous consent can order evening sessions for the consideration of a particular bill and if a quorum or about a quorum can assemble on such special occasion and take up another bill, there is no certainty as to legislation in the future.

Mr. RANDALL. The House has now assembled, and of course can determine for itself.

Mr. KELLEY. The point that I make is that the House has already determined.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order for evening sessions.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to enable the House to take a recess daily for three days of the present week, to wit: Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, at half past four o'clock p. m. until half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no doubt the order was made for that purpose, but at the hour of half past four o'clock this afternoon the Speaker took the Chair and announced the first business in order this evening would be the unfinished business to which, if objection was made, it was done by unanimous consent.

Mr. KELLEY. Objection was not asked for, or it would have been made. I noted the fact.

Mr. RANDALL. I asked for it myself.

Mr. KELLEY. I assume it to be a mistake, because the Speaker has not the power to set aside an order made under a suspension of the rules.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have read from the reporter's notes what occurred at the close of the afternoon's proceedings.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the proceedings as written out by the reporter.

Mr. KELLEY. I consider that the precedent proposed to be established would be a most dangerous one, and not so dangerous to anybody else in the House as to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, be he who he may.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not frightened about it. But if the gentleman claims his right of objection and states that he would have objected if he had known of the decision of the Speaker I will not insist upon it.

Mr. KELLEY. I certainly would have brought to the Speaker's attention the fact that the evening session was to have been held under an order to consider a particular bill named in the order; and I am quite sure that, that fact having been brought to the attention of the Speaker, he would have recognized the force of the suggestion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the proceedings at the termination of the afternoon session, as written out by the reporter.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The Chair will not at this time rule on the point which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] raises because the hour for the recess has arrived. The Chair desires to announce that the gentleman from New York, Mr. COX, will preside at the evening session of to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. This bill as I understand will come up immediately upon the reassembling of the House.

The SPEAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I remember all that; but I find in that nothing to set aside a special order of the House made under a suspension of the rules directing us to consider this evening the bill named in that order.

Mr. RANDALL. I no not insist on taking up the subsidiary silver bill.

Mr. KELLEY. The report of the afternoon's proceedings shows that there was no request for consent, no call for consent, and no opportunity given for any member who remembered the facts to bring them to the Speaker's attention.

Mr. KASSON. I beg to submit one remark upon this subject. An order was not made originally by the House for the exclusive consideration of the legislative appropriation bill. The order reads to enable the House to take up the bill for consideration. The House has it at its own option to lay it aside and proceed with something else. It was an order for an evening session, to enable the House to take up that bill for consideration. But of course I do not interfere with any motion which the gentleman who has charge of the bill desires to make.

Mr. HOAR. If the Chair will permit me, I desire to make a remark. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] be right, then it would be perfectly competent for the Committee of Elections to report an election case, and demand the consideration of the House upon it. Either this special order is binding, not to be reversed even by unanimous consent, or the ordinary business of the House goes on in the ordinary way. It must be one thing or the other.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not press for the consideration of the silver bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] a question. This order under the suspension of the rules was for evening sessions for three days. Now, supposing that, by the end of this evening or of to-morrow evening, we should finish the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill, would it not be perfectly proper under the order as made to go on with other business?

Mr. HOAR. The evening sessions would then fall to the ground.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I differ from the gentleman as to that.

Mr. HOAR. Just as when a session on Saturday for debate only has been ordered the House would adjourn if no gentleman wanted to speak.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

Mr. SPRINGER here took the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

Mr. RANDALL'S motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the paragraph which was pending when the bill was last under consideration in Committee of the Whole.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of Senators, $333,000; and from and after the 30th of June next the compensation of said Senators shall be $4,500 per annum.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose the pending motion was that of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] to strike out the paragraph. That was the pro forma motion, and the Chair will first put it to the vote.

The question being taken on Mr. HOLMAN'S motion to strike out the paragraph, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. DOUGLAS, to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. O'BRIEN, to insert $3,600 in place of $5,000, as moved by the gentleman from Maryland.

The question being taken on Mr. DOUGLAS'S amendment to insert $3,600, it was not agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Maryland to strike out "$4,500" and to insert "$5,000."

The question being taken, there were—ayes 55, noes 106.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

For mileage of Senators, $25,000.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the paragraph and insert as follows:

Mileage for Senators is hereby abolished, and there is substituted therefor their actual traveling expenses, to be ascertained and verified under forms to be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. FOSTER. If this amendment prevails, I shall offer a similar amendment as to the Representatives. It is a well-known fact that if there is any abuse about salaries of Senators and members of Congress, it is this question of mileage. There are members on this floor receiving more than $3,000 a year as mileage, and the only thing that was approved by the people in the "salary-grab" act was the repeal of this mileage abuse. I trust, therefore, that this House, which proposes reform, will reform this abuse and vote in this amendment to the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The Committee on Appropriations considered this subject very fully and very gravely. This subject of mileage has always created great difficulty, and we reached the conclusion that the reduction should attach to the salary proper, and not to the mileage.

There is a great deal to be said on this subject of mileage in connection with the distance that members travel; the greater the distance, the more they are cut off from their constituents, from all their relations at home of a business and domestic character. Take, for instance, members from the Pacific coast; they are entirely cut off from their business relations, and so it is with members from the West.

I admit, for instance, that as I live within one hundred and fifty miles from the Capitol the amount of mileage that I receive is in excess of what I have to pay. I get about $50 mileage and I can travel to my home for about $7; but, all matters considered, the committee deemed it best not to interfere with the mileage. There were abuses as to mileage in former times, and the gentleman from Ohio and the House will recollect that we have reduced our mileage one-half what it formerly was.

I do not know but that it may be the fact that there are members here who receive $3,000, but the committee understand that the mileage did in no instance exceed $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. I have examined the mileage account, and find that the statement I have made is correct.

Mr. RANDALL. Here is a gentleman from California standing near me, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] who I take it comes from as far off as any other gentleman except the gentleman from Oregon, who received only $1,300.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Oregon receives over $1,500 per trip.

Mr. LANE. Allow me to state to the gentleman that I do not think that I received $1,500; my impression is that $1,400 was all I received.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] means $3,000 for the Congress.

Mr. LANE. Well, I think my mileage is less than $3,000, $250 less for the two years.

Mr. RANDALL. I think we had better not venture upon any radical change on the mileage question.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of calling the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that the appropriation for this year for mileage of Senators is $5,000 less than the Senate mileage appropriation of last year, it being then $30,000. I do not as a member of the committee know what reasons were urged for this reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman himself was a member of the subcommittee sent to confer with the chairman of the Appropriation Committee of the Senate; and I believe this is a sufficient amount.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. If the amount appropriated here is not sufficient they can readily change it when the bill reaches the Senate.

Mr. HALE. I do not remember that anything was considered by the subcommittee in relation to the reduction of mileage. It seems to me that it is better, if we are going to carry on the system of changing mileage, to leave the appropriation as it was last year.

Mr. RANDALL. I think $25,000 would be sufficient, but I am willing to change it to $30,000.

Mr. HALE. I hope that will be done unless the gentleman has some reason for reducing the amount.

Mr. RANDALL. I will concur in an amendment to make it $30,000.

Mr. HALE. Then I withdraw my formal motion to strike out the last word, and move to make the sum $30,000 instead of $25,000, the same as last year.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Chairman, it might possibly fall with ill grace from me to favor the striking out of mileage, for the reason that I get so little that at the last session I did not get any; I refused to take any because the amount was so small.

Mr. HALE. If it had been large the gentleman would have taken it.

Mr. LANE. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana, I wish to say in justice to the truth that I was mistaken relative to my mileage; it is over $3,000 for the two years—slightly over.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to argue this question, sir, upon higher grounds, upon the motives and principle which underlie the bill now before the House. We have had here when this bill has been under discussion many very eloquent tributes to that economy and retrenchment which should prevail in the House of Representatives in disbursing money from the public Treasury. Now, sir, if my distinguished friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is in favor of reform—and the meaning of the word reform, as I understand it, is a correction of vicious or corrupt abuses—I think that he ought to favor the striking out of mileage, because no possible excuse can be given for it; it is recognized as a corrupt abuse, a vicious practice, which has been fastened on our legislation to such an extent that no man seems brave enough to vote against it.

Further than that, sir, I am in favor of it because it is genuine retrenchment. Retrenchment means the cutting off of all unnecessary expenses, and I do not conceive that it is necessary that any man should get $1,500 or even $1,000 to enable him to come and go to and from Washington from the place of his residence. Therefore, in view of the very principle which underlies this bill, in advocating economy and retrenchment, we ought here and now to strike down this vicious abuse, which has corrupted our legislation almost from the foundation of the Government; and it is for this reason that I favor the striking out of the mileage, and not for the reason that I am myself entitled to very little.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. HALE to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$30,000," and it was agreed to upon a division—ayes 91, noes 55.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. FOSTER to strike out the clause as amended and insert the following:

Mileage for Senators is hereby abolished, and there is substituted therefor their actual traveling expenses, to be ascertained and verified under forms to be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last two words, for the purpose of saying that I concur in the remarks of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] in reference to the propriety of abolishing this system of mileage. It must be known that it was adopted at a time when members of Congress were compelled to come to this capital upon horseback, by the slow and lumbering stage-coach, by the river, and by the canal, and also when members were paid by the day for the time they were in actual service. Some years since the law was changed so as to pay members of Congress by the year, but still this mileage principle is retained.

It occurs to me that this mileage system is unjust to the Government and to the members themselves. Either those who receive the smallest amount of mileage as members upon this floor receive too little, or else those who receive the most mileage receive too much. It does beyond any sort of doubt establish inequality in the compensation of members upon this floor. I live at an average distance from this capital; I do not live so far off as some gentlemen on this floor, nor do I live so near as many others do. But it is well known to the people of this country that you now can come to this capital in a few hours of comfortable travel, even members from a distance, when years ago it took days of painful and wearisome travel to reach this capital. These facts are known to the people to-day.

With the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] I say that the redeeming feature of the salary law, passed by the Forty-second Congress, was that feature which abolished this mileage principle. According to my idea of public sentiment, there is a demand for reform in this particular respect, and I hope the House will adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. PATTERSON. So far as this amendment is concerned, I speak more in behalf of the members and Delegates of this House and of Senators who reside at a great distance from the capital. There is no doubt about one thing, and that is that, so far as the individual expense of traveling is concerned, the amount received as mileage is greatly in excess of the amount expended in travel. But so far as most of the Delegates are concerned, and most of the Senators who live a great distance from the capital, unfortunately they are married and have pretty large families. [Laughter.] The members from the West are engaged in the fulfillment of the biblical command to "multiply and replenish the earth." [Renewed laughter.]

I do not presume that this Congress desires that its members who reside at a great distance from the capital should come here without their families. Indeed, as I understand it, morality demands that they should not do so, [laughter;] so at least the papers of my Territory have said a dozen times. If it is essential that we should bring our wives and children with us—and you ought to recollect that in one of the Territories at least there is more than one wife to be taken care of, [laughter]—it is hardly fair that we should be compelled to expend the one-third or the one-fourth of the salary we receive as members or Delegates in transporting our families to Washington and back home again.

I came here and brought with me my wife and three children. I know that after the expenses of the trip to Washington and back home again are paid there will be very little left of the mileage I receive. I know that is the case with the Delegates from the other Territories and with the members and Senators who reside at a distance from the capital. A great many of us are compelled to travel a part of the way in the stage-coach, and travel of that kind is exceedingly expensive.

Another difficulty which we labor under is this: If any of our friends at home become sick or if important business demands our attention, as is sometimes the case—as I have discovered to be often the case, by the number of requests for leave of absence that are made here daily—we are compelled to travel a great distance with a great expenditure of money. Therefore, when all sides of the question are taken into consideration, I think the allowance of mileage is not improper nor impolitic.

The gentleman from Maryland says that he does not oppose this amendment striking out mileage because he gets but very little. It is a little singular that when the question of salary was up he was in favor of a salary of $5,000, for the reason, I suppose, that he got it all. [Laughter.] When the question of mileage is up, of which he gets but little, he is attacked with a sudden spasm of retrenchment and reform.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. CALDWELL] to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] is exhausted.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. PAGE. I renew the amendment to the amendment. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read that portion of section 40 of the Revised Statutes relating to the compensation of Senators and members which is incorporated in Barclay's Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of the Senate and Sergeant-at-Arms of the House, respectively, shall deduct from the monthly payments of each member or Delegate the amount of his salary for each day that he has been absent from the Senate or House, respectively, unless such member or Delegate assigns as the reason for such absence the sickness of himself or of some member of his family.

Mr. PAGE. Being one of that class referred to some time ago as having received a large amount of mileage, coming from the Pacific coast, I take this opportunity to say that I shall vote for the amendment to strike out mileage entirely. I voted for a similar proposition at the last session of Congress, and if I remember aright that proposition passed this House. The Representatives from California do not want any more than is received by the other members of Congress. The gentleman who has just taken his seat adduced some very strong arguments in favor of mileage; but the Representatives from California and the Pacific coast generally are naturally modest, and they do not want any more money than members of this House think they are entitled to.

But I submit whether it is not fair that the rules of the House should be enforced, so that when members residing so near the Capitol as to be able to reach their homes in an hour or two are absent attending to their business—practicing in the courts, &c.—their pay should be deducted for the time of their absence. I submit, sir, that this is no more than fair and equitable, because it is understood that a Representative from the Pacific coast is unable to return to his home until after the adjournment of Congress. I shall support the amendment to strike out mileage. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FORT. I offer the following substitute for the pending amendment:

The mileage of Senators shall hereafter be fifteen cents per mile, to be computed and paid as now provided by law.

Mr. Chairman, I believe it is pretty well understood that the bill now under consideration has been drafted upon principles of retrenchment and economy. I discover, however, that while there has been a universal disposition to retrench in all other matters there has been none applied to this system of mileage. In my judgment, if there be any subject to which retrenchment ought to be applied it is this. If we can retrench 10 per cent. in other matters, it occurs to me that we should retrench 25 per cent. in this.

As has been well said, the allowance of mileage is perhaps, after all, proper. A member residing a long distance from this capital cannot afford to come here and serve at the same rate of pay as a member who lives near to Washington. The former necessarily expends more money. If anything happens at his home requiring him to return there, he cannot do so in a few hours to attend to his business or visit his family without spending much more money than a member living adjacent to the capital. As has been said by the Delegate from Colorado, [Mr. PATTERSON,] one visit to his home may consume entirely his mileage.

Now, gentlemen living near the capital can attend to business at home; they can go there to practice law or visit their families at small expense. If they bring their families with them, be the families large or small, the expense is inconsiderable; but when they live at a long distance, as some members do, the expense is very considerable. I think it is well settled that the system of mileage is, after all, correct and should be continued. The amendment proposed by myself is only in keeping with the remainder of the bill, in order that we may retrench in this respect as well as in others.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I rise to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That would not be in order, because an amendment to an amendment is already pending.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment. I do not suppose I shall be able to say anything that will instruct anybody about this matter; but I do want to say that the manly way for us to do when we fix our pay is to fix it at a specified sum, and with that be content. As it now is, this matter of mileage is not for the payment of expenses of traveling, but is designed to pay indirectly a part of the salary not as mileage, but as compensation for many members of Congress—doing that indirectly which we have not the nerve to do directly.

It has been said that the mileage does not inure equally to members. That is true. For instance, I live out in Illinois, about one thousand miles from here. My mileage is about $400. The traveling costs two cents a mile, and the expense here and back is, I believe, about $40. The balance goes to make up my salary, not to pay the expenses of travel.

Gentlemen have spoken of the expense of traveling with their wives and children; if that is to be taken into consideration, why do you not amend the law so as to allow mileage for the wife and a mileage for each child? You might in that way encourage marriage and large families. [Laughter.] Or, as some gentleman suggests, you might allow salaries to the wife and children.

We have broken down a long-standing rule of this House in order that we might legislate in the interest of reform. Let us now commence. If $5,000, together with actual traveling expenses, is what we ought to have, let us give it. If $4,500 is right, let us give that. Let us not "whip the devil round the stump" any longer in this era of reform. I object to making up our compensation by an allowance of $4,500, if you please, as salary, (with which I am content,) $125 for stationery, and even a little bit of an appropriation for packing-boxes. This system, to my notion, is not very manly. I would for that reason prefer that we fix the salary at a stated sum and cut off all these things. Therefore I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to cut off mileage and allow actual traveling expenses only.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Has not the gentleman taken heretofore his stationery and boxes?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. O. yes, I take the stationery; I take the boxes, and everything of that kind; I expect to take everything else that the law gives me the same as other gentlemen do. If $4,500 is not enough salary, let us fix $5,000; or, if it be thought right, name $3,000 as the salary; but, whatever you fix, let it be a specific sum to cover our aggregate compensation. Let us not be receiving six or eight hundred dollars more than we are representing to the country that we get; because after all I guess we do not fool the people very much; and the present method of making up our compensation is not very manly, in my opinion.

Mr. FOSTER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted on the pending amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to the amendment already pending.

Mr. FORT'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I move the following amendment:

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no member of either House of Congress elected to fill a vacancy shall hereafter be paid for any time prior to the day of his election.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, I resolved very seriously, on listening to the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts the other day, hereafter to stand upon the dignity of my office in respect to the question of salary and mileage; but I have discovered, on a very slight examination, that the garment is too narrow to cover us. That amendment, Mr. Chairman, depends upon the ascertainment of a fact that a member of the Forty-third Congress, elected to fill a vacancy, a vacancy in the last Congress, received about $4,000 for three months' service, going back five or six months beyond the day of his election.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I propose, on the dignity of a member of the House of Representatives of the United States of America, to bring this fact to the attention of the House. I repeat, that a member, elected to fill a vacancy——

Mr. O'BRIEN. Who? From what State?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. In my own State, from the State of New York, Mr. Schell, elected to fill a vacancy in the Forty-third Congress and serving here three months at the rate of $5,000 a year, received thirty-nine hundred and odd dollars. I had the figures in my pocket yesterday, but find I have left them at home. I vouch for them, as I took them from the books. That goes straight to the point. There is a case pending in the Senate, which I am informed by gentlemen who understand it, insures to the man who may be appointed to fill the vacancy something like $20,000. I say, on my dignity as a member of this House, I want every member of it to vote clearly and intelligently on that simple question, and I shall call for the yeas and nays on it. [Laughter.] Now, I do not know but what my time is up. [Cries of "Go on!" "Go on"!] If I had time I would like to discuss this question very briefly.

Mr. JENKS. Has the gentleman any objection to my reading section 51 of the Revised Statutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JENKS. Let us have the law read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 51. Whenever a vacancy occurs in either House of Congress by death or otherwise of any member or Delegate elected or appointed thereto after the commencement of the Congress to which he has been elected or appointed, the person elected or appointed to fill the vacancy shall be compensated from the time the compensation of his predecessor ceased.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I knew that was the law, and my amendment was intended to repeal it.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to object to the withdrawing of any amendments hereafter.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I was recognized some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from New York makes an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who has already spoken, and the gentleman from Michigan rises to oppose it.

Mr. FOSTER. You recognized me some time ago to oppose it.

Mr. CONGER. I recognize the gentleman with all the committee. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. CONGER. I do. [Laughter.]

Mr. FOSTER. I desire simply to submit a statement which I take from the speech made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania in the last House, [Mr. SMITH,] which gave us the mileage in the Forty-third Congress as well as the actual expense. The House will remember in the last Congress at one time we substituted actual expense for mileage, and this table shows the result. I will read so far as it relates to two or three States. For one district in Minnesota $1,600 was paid for mileage, while the actual expense was $112. Seventeen hundred and forty dollars was paid for mileage from Dakota while $123 was the actual expense. A member from one of the districts of California received two thousand five hundred and odd dollars for mileage and the actual expense was $420. In the case of Washington Territory, $3,500 was paid for mileage and $579 was the actual expense. From Oregon $3,900 mileage was paid and $590 the actual expense. The result shows while mileage would cost $196,000 the actual expense was only $46,000, showing a saving of $150,000.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CONGER. I cannot yield to all these other gentlemen. [Laughter.] I will yield to the gentleman from California.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California has one minute left. [Laughter.]

Mr. LUTTRELL. I wish to reply to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio. When he states that a member of Congress from Oregon received $3,900 when the actual expense was only $400, he is mistaken unless that member traveled on a free pass. [Laughter.] I for one do not travel on a free pass.

Mr. FOSTER. I said $590.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I know full well what it costs. I know well that no man can travel and make the four trips he has to make in representing a district there for two years without being out nearly $1,000 for traveling expenses. And I will say further that the first year I was here my express charges and postage cost me $1,155; and when the gentleman states that the traveling expenses of a member from Minnesota are only $123, it must certainly be that he travels on a free pass.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I think it fair that I should say that I alluded to Mr. Schell, of New York.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has expired.

The question being taken on Mr. CHITTENDEN'S amendment to the amendment, it was agreed to—ayes 115, noes 30.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER.]

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I simply desire to say a word on this question of mileage. As the bill now stands there will be appropriated for the payment of the mileage of Senators the sum of $30,000, which is equivalent to a little over $400 to each Senator for his mileage. I make an estimate, and I think a liberal one, that the average actual expenses of each Senator in coming to and returning from this capital cannot exceed for a Congress above $150. Deduct this from the amount which Senators now receive, $400, and there is left a net gain to the Treasury for each amounting to $250.

Now, then, we propose to reduce the direct salary of a Senator $500. Here is an opportunity to further reduce the salary of each Senator about $250 more. I hold, Mr. Chairman, that this matter of mileage is nothing more nor less than so much salary added to each member who draws it. I live near the city of Buffalo, and my mileage is something less than $200. I live at a distance from the capital which precludes me from returning home to attend to my duties during the entire session unless it be for something exceedingly important. When I bring my family here I come expecting to stay to the end of the session. Gentlemen living in the parts of the country most remote from the capital come here in the same way. And I maintain, if these gentlemen are paid their actual traveling expenses in coming from and returning to their homes and I receive mine, it matters not what the distance may be, they and I stand upon precisely the same footing, and I desire that every member upon this floor shall have precisely the same pay in the aggregate that I have myself, but I do not desire that any one shall have one dollar more.

The allowance of the actual traveling expenses is the only equal and just way of settling this matter and reducing the salaries equitably. The amendment as proposed will reduce the salary of each Senator by the average amount of $250, which will be about one-half the amount proposed by the bill. I shall vote first for the committee's proposition to fix the salary at $4,500, and I shall also vote to equalize the mileage by making the amount paid to each member going to and returning from this capital the amount he shall receive in lieu of all mileage.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Chairman, it will make little difference to me whether mileage or actual traveling expenses are allowed. My actual traveling expenses in consequence of long travel by stage amount to nearly as much as the mileage. I might, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. CALDWELL,] make the point on which this question seemed to be decided when the subject of mileage was up in the Senate two years ago. The gentleman said that originally the salary of members was so much per day, and congressmen got $8 a day during their attendance and while traveling to and from their homes. Now, although finally the salary was lumped, and there was so much paid for the Congress or session, it was fixed on the basis of the average number of days occupied during each Congress. I beg to call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that members who live at a great distance from the capital are obliged to put in very many more days in the service of the Government than gentlemen who live here or near the capital. For instance, I am obliged to put twenty or thirty days more in the service of the Government than the gentleman from Maryland, because I have to spend that much more time in traveling to and from my home, and per diem for that time, if calculated on the ratio of the number of days spent in attendance on Congress, at the rate of $5,000 per annum, would amount to a great deal more than all the mileage allowed.

I think the mileage system is the proper one. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] read from a speech by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SMITH,] made in the last Congress, showing the difference between the actual traveling expenses of members and their mileage. And he might have read also from that same statement another thing that might be construed to reflect somewhat discreditably on several members: in cases where two members started from places equally distant and traveled by like modes of conveyance, and yet in many instances the bill of one member for actual expenses was twice or three times greater than that of another member traveling the same distance. I hold that the mileage system, as a system, is the proper one. If the amount allowed is too large, reduce it. Reduce the rate to fifteen cents or five cents or even to two cents per mile, whatever is right, and fix one rate for railroad and another for stage travel; but the dignity of all will be best preserved by adherence to one fixed and uniform rule.

In connection with this point, I would ask the Clerk to read the statement of the Paymaster-General of the Army on the abuses that have arisen in the Army from this system of allowing actual traveling expenses and his earnest recommendation of a return to the mileage system.

The Clerk read as follows:

Attention is respectfully invited to the subject of re-imbursement to officers of cost of travel under orders.

Prior to July 1, 1874, a system of mileages prevailed, for which legislation has since substituted the system of "actual expenses." (See act of June 16, 1874.)

For short journeys "actual expenses" are found, in the majority of cases, to exceed "mileage," for the reason that the allowances for expenses of delays incident to the duty ordered are large in proportion to the distance traveled.

For long journeys the reverse is the case, for the reason that the distance traveled is much greater in proportion to the restricted time for which, under War Department rules, expenses of delays incident to duty may be charged, so that the item of charges for delays is not an important one in accounts for long journeys.

In the aggregate, payments on account of actual expenses fall short in amount of what would be the sum of mileage allowances for the same journeys.

The pecuniary advantage to the Government, so far as concerns the Army, of a system of actual expenses is believed, however, to fall short of the objections to the system, which may be briefly stated as follows:

First. The labor to the officer, to the paymaster, to this office, and to the Treasury Department in the preparation, payment, and scrutiny of the vouchers is a hundred-fold more than in the case of mileage vouchers, for the reason that each item has to be specially set forth and separately scrutinized. The statement of items sometimes covers two, and even three, pages of foolscap, whereas a mileage voucher for the same journey would have involved the consideration and treatment of but a single item of charge.

Second. Experience of systems of actual expenses has shown that the authorities have invariably been obliged, sooner or later, to dispense with itemized accounts, and arbitrarily fix a measure of actual expenses, on a basis of time or distance, which is practically a mileage system. This is owing to the fact that different men take diverse views of what constitutes actual necessary expenses, and of the moral obligation to conform to an order which assumes to prescribe what shall be alone regarded as items of such expenses. Hence, persistent effort on the part of many to obtain re-imbursement of expenses not authorized in orders, and to remove certain restrictions, and in some cases to include unauthorized items in charges for others authorized, and which may have exceeded, in amount, the actual outlay thereunder. Contingent allowances become subjects of common charge, without reference to the existence of the conditions to which they were specially attached. Gradually the system becomes one of such abuse that refuge is taken, as above stated, in mileage, or a like system of a uniform measure of allowances.

Third. The foregoing suggests plainly enough how unequally a system of "actual expenses" operates upon different men, and to what extent it tends to demoralization.

Fourth. Mileage charges are easily computed, quickly paid, and readily scrutinized. A mileage allowance, therefore, forms the most convenient system of reimbursement of travel expenses. The experience of officers will sustain the statement that on the average of the whole period of service it is no more than a reimbursement of actual expenses, and is uniform in its operations upon all.

Fifth. The debate upon the provision of "actual expenses" in the act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, clearly shows that it was based on the understanding that the charge made in the House of Representatives, to the effect that constructive mileage was paid to Government officials, applied equally to officers of the Army. I challenge the proof of a single case in which mileage has been paid to an officer of the Army for other than actual travel under competent orders.

The allowance and payment of mileage to officers of the Army is so hedged about that there can be and were no abuses of it which are not inseparable from any allowance based upon orders issued at the discretion of men. Therefore I earnestly recommend a return to the system of mileage as better fitted to do justice to the officer and to the Government.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not competent for a member to send up under the five-minute rule any document to be read that takes more than five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time of the gentleman from Montana has expired.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I ask unanimous consent that the whole of the Paymaster-General's recommendation that actual traveling expenses be abolished and mileage allowed be printed as a part of my remarks.

There was no objection, and the recommendation of the Paymaster-General is printed above.

Mr. HOSKINS. I withdraw my amendment to strike out the last word.

Mr. KELLEY. I renew it.

Mr. Chairman, I think that our constituents, if not already disgusted, soon will be with the cheap efforts which are being made for popularity by proposing to cut down our own emoluments. I am interested in the mileage question to the extent of $50; I state that fact without saying whether it is very valuable to me or not. When I first came to this House I received $3,000 a year and a little over $100 as mileage. I served on two committees and worked pretty hard in the House, and I found that there were Delegates here who could not vote and did not serve on committees getting one of them over $12,000 and one over $13,000. I thought it was a little unequal, and I worked to get the pay up and the mileage down, and the salary was fixed at $5,000 and the mileage reduced one-half, which equalized the pay and did not increase the expense to the Government; and the change provoked no hostility that I know of in any quarter of the country.

The American people do not thank their representatives for exhibiting meanness, which they regard as rather disgraceful. The rich man says to his constituents, "Behold how free I am from all pecuniary considerations, when I propose to surrender one-twentieth of what you know I spent to get my place." The poor man says, "I cannot afford to be behind him; I know the value of a few dollars; I will let the poor part of my constituents see that I do not want to live any better than they do;" and after all I think the constituents of all classes say "bah!" to it all. [Laughter.] That is my judgment.

I wish to make the remark that this mileage wickedness came down from the days when every man that was elected to Congress was a patriot, when they were not degenerate as we are. That system by which forty cents a mile was given for the distance members came, came down to us from the early days of the Republic. It was only our degeneracy that put it aside.

Now, I am ready to vote for a salary of $5,000 a year and whatever measure of mileage shall be fair. I do not wish to see mileage abolished. It is of small interest to me; but for those who travel a month in coming here, who travel in stage-coaches, who travel where meals are high and every expense large, who have nearly a month more time to spend in coming and going than I have, there ought to be a compensation for them; and to make that compensation depend on a member stating when, where, and how he had his boots blacked, [laughter,] or repeat Governor Marcy's charge for mending his pantaloons, is a mean and not a good system, and will lead to very unfair charges.

Mr. HOAR rose.

Mr. KELLEY. I withdraw the amendment, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts wishes to oppose it.

Mr. HOAR. I do not propose to debate the question, but to move an amendment of substance which I beg the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] to assent to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Before the gentleman from Massachusetts offers his amendment, I would like to say a few words.

Mr. HOAR. I will yield my time to the gentleman.

I desire now to move to strike out that part of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio where the words "actual expenses" occur, and to substitute in lieu thereof these: "traveling expenses of themselves and one member of their families, actually incurred, to be ascertained and vouched for by rules prescribed by the Senate."

My amendment allows the Senate to prescribe its own method of having vouchers, and allows a Senator to charge the traveling expenses of himself and one member of his family besides himself, if accompanied by one. I now yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I wish this question could be permanently settled, and I do not think it can ever be settled until we abolish mileage altogether. Nothing has struck me so forcibly since I have been a member of the House as the zeal with which members of the House living within fifty or one hundred miles of the capital attack this mileage.

Now, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] and the other pending amendments looking to the reduction of the present mileage are neither just, fair, nor reasonable. The mileage as arranged now is perhaps as fairly arranged as it can be arranged. The gentleman from Massachusetts who has just offered an amendment touches a point that should be considered in relation to this question. He says that he is willing that a Senator or member shall have mileage for himself and one member of his family. Now, what member of my family shall it be that I bring on here? Must it be my wife or one of my children? If I bring my wife and myself, I must leave the baby at home, and I am too poor to pay for bringing both. Which shall I bring? If the family of a member shall consist of more than four persons, it will take all the mileage he gets to pay the expense of bringing those four persons here and taking them home again. Every consideration requires that a member should bring his family here, unless he be situated as I am; that is, when both my salary and mileage are too little to justify me in bringing my family here at all.

Now, as we spent six weeks in the last Congress trying to settle this question, I hope the committee will now agree to wipe out the mileage altogether, and not put western members perpetually to the blush in having to vote on the amount of their own mileage and perquisites.

Mr. RANDALL. As we have got down to the "bah" and bray arguments, I think it is about time to close the debate on this paragraph. Unless unanimous consent be given to close debate on the pending clause, I shall move that the committee rise, so as to obtain an order from the House to close debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman yield to me for five minutes?

Mr. RANDALL. I will do so.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the gentleman will yield five minutes to each member.

Mr. RANDALL. I will yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] and then I will renew my suggestion to close the debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can speak in opposition to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose pro forma simply the amendment to the amendment, and will commence by saying that this subject of mileage and compensation is a delicate one for any member of the Wisconsin delegation. We do not forget that the political prospects of one of the most brilliant and gifted sons which our State ever sent forth were wrecked upon the rock labeled "congressional salaries." The rest of us may walk with humility in the light of illustrious example.

But, sir, as this seems to be a time for free confessional, I will say that this is a subject which touches me tenderly and upon which I speak with deep feeling. I suppose it is proper that the grade of our expenditures should be freely canvassed and fully understood. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has referred to his own case and expressed a fear that he might have to leave his baby at home. I will say that I came here and brought my wife with me, as I thought to be meet and proper. My little boy I left at home, a thousand miles away, and the sole representative of the family; my daughter I sent to her aunt in Central New York, where she is boarding on half-pay. [Laughter.] My niece I allowed to come here for four weeks. But this morning—and that is the reason I speak with unction on this occasion—I received a confidential letter from a kind friend informing me that the subject is being canvassed by a few of my constituents whether I ought not to be defeated for a renomination because that little niece wore too many "ribbons" at Secretary Fish's reception, as they are informed by some kind representative of the press. [Great laughter.] The real truth—and we are entitled to know it all—compels me to add that, not having the money by me just then, another uncle purchased the ribbons and outfit, be they more or less, and they did not come out of my salary at all. [Renewed and continued laughter.]

But to proceed. I have rented a single room for myself and wife in a comfortable house with a most excellent family, and we are living at a cheaper rate, as I am informed, than the most economical, proper, and prudent member of our delegation who has neither wife nor children here. Yet I am informed, and that is where I feel stricken to-night, that after all this I am to be defeated for a renomination on the ground of extravagance. I have written my little daughter that she might come here from New York. But I am anxiously waiting the action of this House, and testing the pulse of the public upon this bill to determine whether I shall countermand the order by telegraph. [Laughter.]

Do you ask me if under these circumstances I feel mean? Great God! I never felt so mean before in all my life. [Great laughter.] Do you ask me if that notification I received is a sample of the sentiments which I represent? I stand here to declare that it is not; that I represent one of the oldest, the most wealthy, enlightened, and liberal districts in my State. They want economy in the best sense of the term. They want no extravagance, and they want honor, fidelity, and courage. And if I cannot stand here, as I intend to do before the debate on this bill closes, should I have the opportunity, and avow my honest sentiments without fear or trembling, then I will serve notice on them, six months in advance, and let them get their political guns ready to blow me out of the water. [Laughter.] They understand me. I think I understand them. At least we have never yet misunderstood each other on any question of a public nature.

You may ask me if with all this economy I am getting rich. No, sad to say, I am not. I do not spend my money for cigars or drink. I believe my habits are reasonably good. Like my friend from California, [Mr. LUTTRELL,] I do not ride on free passes, at least I have not since the grangers thought them "extrahazardous." [Laughter.] But somehow or other at the end of the year—I cannot understand it; I think my constituents would if they would come here with part of their families and scatter the rest around the country—I say that, notwithstanding all my efforts at economy, active and enterprising committee-men, individuals benevolently inclined, insinuating creditors, beggars, and bores take the whole, and at the end of the year pecuniarily I am like—

> The stone of Sisyphus rolling on apace,
> Returns at last and rests at the base.

[Great laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL. I now ask unanimous consent that all debate on the pending clause in relation to the mileage of members may be considered as closed.

There was no objection.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. HOAR to the amendment of Mr. FOSTER, so that the latter portion would read: "The traveling expenses of themselves, and of one member of their family, if actually incurred, to be ascertained under rules prescribed by the Senate."

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the amendment of Mr. FOSTER, to strike out the clause as amended and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

> Mileage for Senators is hereby abolished, and there is substituted therefor their actual traveling expenses, to be ascertained and verified under forms to be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The question was taken; and upon a division there were—ayes 88, noes 131.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. FOSTER. I call for tellers. I have a proposition to make to the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations [Mr. RANDALL] to allow this amendment to be voted on in the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no such instructions from the committee.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered, there being thirty in the affirmative, more than one-fifth of a quorum, and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. FOSTER were appointed.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes 73, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

> For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the Senate, namely: For Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer, $4,500, and for hire of horse and wagon for his use, $500; Chief Clerk, $2,500; principal clerk, principal executive clerk, and minute and journal clerk, at $2,250 each; financial clerk in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $2,000; librarian, $1,800; and five clerks in the office of the Secretary of the Senate, at $2,000 each; clerk of printing records, $1,600; five clerks, $1,800 each; keeper of the stationery, $1,500; one messenger, $1,200; chaplain, $900; secretary to the Vice-President, $1,800; clerk to the Committee on Finance, $2,200; clerk to the Committee on Claims, $2,000; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $2,220; assistant keeper of the stationery, $1,200; Sergeant-at-Arms and Doorkeeper, $4,000; assistant doorkeeper, $2 000; acting assistant doorkeeper, $1,800; chief messenger assisting doorkeeper, $1,800; postmaster to the Senate, $2,000; assistant postmaster and mail-carrier, $1,800; two mail-carriers, at $125 per month during the session; superintendent of the document-room, $1,800; one assistant in document-room, at $1,200; superintendent of the folding-room, $1,800; one clerk in the folding-room, $1,200; twenty-three messengers, at $125 per month each during the session; one laborer in charge of private passage, $840; chief engineer, $1,800; two assistant engineers, at $1,200 each; assistant engineer in charge of the Senate elevator, $1,200; two firemen, at $900 each; seven laborers, at $720 each; and one female in charge of ladies' retiring-room, $600; telegraph operator, at the rate of $100 per month during the session, $400; and ten laborers, at the rate of $720 per annum during the session of the Senate, $2,400; making in all $100,050.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I move to amend by adding the following to the paragraph just read:

> For messenger's place, to be held by Sidney L. Willson, disabled soldier, $1,200.

Mr. Chairman, I believe there are precedents for making special provision for certain employés, and I desire as a confederate soldier to offer this amendment in favor of a Union soldier who at Gettysburgh lost both legs, and is now a messenger in the Senate wing of the Capitol. I want to insure beyond all contingencies that he shall be retained in his place. That is my reason for offering the amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to the amendment; but if the gentleman will tell me what office this man holds in the Senate, I will make the number of that character of officers one less.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. He is a messenger. I hope, however, that this will be put at the end of the paragraph as an addition to all the others.

Mr. RANDALL. I think the gentleman had better amend by providing that "one of the messengers provided for shall be" so and so, naming the man whoever he is. It is rather unusual, I suggest, for this House to declare who shall be the officers of the Senate. Still this is an exceptional case.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I desire, if the gentleman will allow me, to say——

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman be kind enough to inform the House under what constitutional power we can appoint an officer by law? The Constitution provides that officers may be appointed by the President, by the heads of Departments, and by the courts. In addition to that, each branch of Congress, as an incident to its legislative power, has the right to appoint its own officers.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] allow me to call his attention——

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I hope I shall not be taken entirely off the floor by other gentlemen.

Mr. HOAR. I asked for information merely. I have not considered the point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from North Carolina yield to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER?]

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Yes, sir.

Mr. TUCKER. The third section of the first article of the Constitution provides that—

The Senate shall choose their other officers and also a President pro tempore, &c.

Now, how we can provide in any law that the Senate shall have a particular officer, I cannot see.

Mr. RANDALL. We might do it for our own House.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I see in this very bill in line 200 a precedent for the amendment I have offered. I refer to this clause:

One messenger, Henry Douglass, $840.

Mr. RANDALL. That is one of our own officers.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I desire to say that I wish to offer, at the proper time, an exactly similar amendment to the paragraph in regard to the employés of the House. We can certainly make this provision for the payment of that man. We leave the responsibility with the Senate whether they will appoint him; we merely assist in providing the money for the place. We do not undertake to appoint him; we only provide that so much money shall be appropriated for him if he holds the place. The Senate can turn him out if they choose. And I would like to know whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is opposed to his holding the place, or whether he thinks the Senate is opposed to it?

Mr. SPRINGER. The Senate will be democratic in the next Congress and will take care of him.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. The House, which is democratic, which is sometimes called "confederate," is in favor of these things. I hope the Senate is not opposed to them; and I trust that the other side of the House is not opposed to them.

Mr. HOAR. In answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, I wish to say that I should consider it entirely unworthy of my own position to enter into the kind of debate which his question seems to challenge.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. It has been taken up by other gentlemen. I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman who last spoke, [Mr. HOAR.] I should have liked very much to hear them.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Chairman, it is an encouraging spectacle to see that the gentleman from North Carolina has extended his sympathetic researches to the Senate and has taken upon himself the guardianship of the fortunes of wounded soldiers. I venture to suggest to him that the Senate may possibly be competent to care for that class of persons.

The Committee on Appropriations has seen fit (I think wisely) to reduce the whole number of messengers in the Senate, as it has done in the House; but it has not seen fit to indicate to the Senate who and what class of men shall fill the places that are left. If the gentleman from North Carolina has upon his hands some good Union soldier that he wants taken care of, it will probably be safe for him, as I have said, to leave the matter to the appointing power in the Senate, or perchance he may find the opportunity on this side of the Capitol to care for that soldier for whom he is so solicitous.

Mr. RANDALL. Upon reflection I feel that it would be in bad taste for the House to attempt to indicate to the Senate the appointment of any particular individual. I have no doubt that the Senate will take care of this soldier, who has lost both his legs, just as this House has taken care of a Union soldier, a republican, who has no arms. There was but one sentiment here in favor of the retention of that Union soldier, although he had come in under a republican administration. And I commend the Doorkeeper of this House for his good heart in responding to the unanimous expression of the democratic members here that that Union soldier who had lost both arms should be retained permanently in the employment of this House. I feel that the Senate will take care of their Union soldier, who was more badly wounded, as we have taken care of the man who is unable to feed himself by reason of the loss of both arms in the battles of the country.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, if gentlemen will observe the form of the amendment they will see there is nothing which dictates to the Senate. It only makes an appropriation of so much money for this man if he shall be employed by the Senate as a messenger. If he does not hold that place, then of course the money is not appropriated. It leaves it optional with the Senate whether they will put him in or not. We make the appropriation for him to fill this place, and if he does not fill it, then the appropriation is not made. It is perfectly competent to say we appropriate that much money so long as he shall hold this place.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to oppose the amendment and do not wish to see the amendment rejected. I consider my friend from Virginia labors under a misconception of the Constitution. The Constitution, as the gentleman from Virginia has read, says the Senate shall choose their other officers. Now, the gentleman does not say a messenger is an officer of the Senate in the legal significance of that term. If so, the Senate would have the right to vote for each and every messenger. The Constitution says, too, this House shall choose its own officers. Does that mean that the House shall vote for its messengers, its pages, and other employés? These are mere employés appointed by the officers elected by the Senate and by the House. He is not an officer; he is a mere employé of the Senate. He is not chosen by the Senate, but by an officer of the Senate who is appointed by the Senate.

I am really surprised at my elegant friend from Virginia, who is so ordinarily correct, in getting up and intimating that a messenger is an officer of the Senate. That is not strict construction. [Laughter.] That is entirely too liberal. It is latitudinarian—it is consolidation. [Laughter.] I oppose such centralism, especially from Virginia. [Laughter.]

I say there is nothing in the point made on the amendment of my friend from North Carolina. This messenger is an employé and not an officer, and therefore there is no difficulty in my judgment in the Constitution. The House does not appoint—no one appoints him. The House simply designates—expresses to the appointing power of the Senate that so long as they keep a man by the name of Sidney L. Willson as their employé this House agrees he shall receive $1,200, and he has no right to that $1,200 without the concurrence of this House. The Senate cannot fix the salary. We fix the salary and intimate to the Senate they shall have a messenger so long as they keep a messenger by the name of Sydney L. Willson.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. As a practical fact, what does he think would be the result in the House if the Senate should put on a clause declaring that such a man should be one of its employés? What does he think would be the sentiment of the House as to that act of the Senate?

Mr. HILL. I would say this: The gentleman's question does not apply to the amendment. We do not say the Senate shall employ this man, and the Senate need not say we shall employ this man. We do not say to the Doorkeeper he shall appoint a page. We simply agree so long as the Senate according to their own rule and the direction of their officer shall keep in employment a man by the name of Sidney L. Willson, he shall receive $1,200 a year. That is all there is in this amendment.

Mr. HALE. That is, that they shall have no messenger provided unless they shall keep in employment the man whom we indicate.

Mr. HILL. Certainly we have the right to qualify, and if they do not choose to agree they can disagree to it, and there is no harm done.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FOSTER. I move to insert the words "in the House of Representatives;" so it will read: "a messenger in the House of Representatives."

Mr. KASSON. That is right; let us appoint him here, where we have the power.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the point the amendment is not in order, as we have not reached that point of the bill relating to the House of Representatives.

Mr. FOSTER. We have reached the man.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not in order to make an amendment fixing the compensation of members of the House until we reach that part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is out of order in this part of the bill, as the committee is now dealing with the employés of the Senate.

Mr. TUCKER. May I make a speech without moving an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can move to amend pro forma.

Mr. TUCKER. I think, sir, I may rise to a personal explanation or a question of privilege. [Laughter.] I might say to my distinguished friend from Georgia, [Mr. HILL,] who has called me to account for my strict construction——

Mr. HILL. For your too liberal construction.

Mr. TUCKER. For my latitudinarian construction, that I would have submitted to the criticism from any gentleman rightfully on the side of the House where my friend now sits. But as he has taken service on the other side, like a certain Captain Dugald Dalgetty, on this occasion I may say, "Et tu, Brute." I will merely say that the question struck me as a very clear one at the moment as it seemed to have struck the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I think my friend from Georgia will see, when he collates two or more clauses of the Constitution, that my construction was right.

The language in the second section of the first article of the Constitution is:

The House of Representatives shall choose their Speaker and other officers.

In the third section it is:

The Senate shall choose their other officers and also a President pro tempore.

And in the fifth section it is:

Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings.

Now, I take it that no officer of this House holds his office, whether as employé, messenger, or whatever name he may be called by, by virtue of any inherent appointing power in the Sergeant-at-Arms, the Clerk, the Doorkeeper, or anybody else. The emanation of authority to hold the office is from the House; and the House may choose its officers either immediately or mediately through its other officers. But when the House by its rules declares that the House shall elect the Doorkeeper, and the Doorkeeper may appoint his assistants, that the House shall appoint the Clerk and the Clerk may appoint his assistant clerks, I say that the House is choosing its own officers mediately through the officers it chooses directly.

Mr. HILL. I will ask my friend a question. Could the Senate authorize the Doorkeper or the Secretary to choose a President pro tempore? The Constitution says the Senate shall choose its own officers. The gentleman says an officer may be chosen by a doorkeeper by direction of the House or by authority of the House. Could the Senate authorize any subordinate officer to appoint a President pro tempore?

Mr. NEW. Will the gentleman from Georgia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. TUCKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. I would ask the gentleman from Georgia whether it would or would not be competent for the House to deprive an employé of his position?

Mr. HILL. I suppose if the House desired to discharge an offensive employé it would direct the appointing officer of the House to discharge that employé; and if he did not obey the order of the House, I suppose the House would discharge that officer.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman from Virginia allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. TUCKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. Are not the assistant doorkeepers punishable under the statute as the principal Doorkeeper would be for taking bribes?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I rise to oppose the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. My time is out in consequence of other gentlemen having taken it.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think it is well for the consideration of this bill that the debate on this fine point should last any longer. I therefore suggest that debate close upon this paragraph, and that the vote be taken on the amendment.

Mr. TUCKER. I appeal to my friend to give me a single minute.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman three minutes.

Mr. TUCKER. My construction of this whole matter is this: that this House itself could not by law appoint one of its own employés, because if he is appointed by law, it would require law to remove him; and if we appoint an officer of the Senate by law, it would require a repeal of the law before he could be removed; the effect of which would be that an officer offensive to either House could not be removed without the consent of the other, when the Constitution gives to each House the exclusive power to determine who shall be its own officers. I think, therefore, looking at all the provisions of the Constitution on this subject, that my construction is right, and that my friend from Georgia [Mr. HILL] for once is wrong.

Mr. HILL. You are very latitudinarian.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I want to add a word. Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for the doctrine of a strict construction of the Constitution, and I profess to belong myself to the strict-construction school; but this raising of constitutional points of strict construction on every occasion in regard to little matters like this I think injures the cause of strict construction. If you make the Constitution of the United States a strait-jacket, it will be torn; but if you make it a comfortably fitting, easy-wearing coat, we will wear it and not tear it. But for my part I must protest against this idea of turning the Constitution of the United States into a strait-jacket. Construe that instrument not by any means on latitudinarian principles, but on reasonable principles, and you can preserve it and enforce it better. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. McCRARY. I renew it. I am not very much concerned about the question of strict construction of the Constitution in regard to this matter, although I am satisfied that the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is correct in saying that each House of Congress has the exclusive right to appoint and to remove its own officers and its own employés. But, sir, beyond that there is a question of some importance suggested by this amendment. The proposition, if adopted, would unavoidably lead to very great difficulties and very great confusion. It is, sir, a proposition that one House shall undertake to dictate to the other as to the persons who shall be employed by it in certain capacities or in certain offices under the control of that House.

Now, sir, suppose that the proposition is adopted and becomes a part of this bill when it is sent to the other branch of Congress; as a matter of course, the Senate will concur in the amendment, and say that, if this House will appoint John Jones to a certain position here, then there shall be an appropriation made for his pay. The proposition, sir, if it shall be adopted, will lead to continual attempts, in one or the other House, by amendments like this, to control in matters which that House has no right to control and which it is utterly impracticable that it should control.

Again, sir, if the purpose of this amendment is to do an act of kindness to a wounded soldier, I submit to the House that this is the very way in which to defeat that purpose. I undertake to say here that the Senate never will and never should consent to be dictated to by this House as to the persons who shall be appointed as their employés. I undertake to say, as a member of this House, that I never would consent to be dictated to by the Senate, and I apprehend that the rights and privileges of one House are as sacred as those of the other.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee rise; and I do it for the purpose of asking in the House to have the debate closed on this amendment unless I can obtain unanimous consent for the same result in the committee.

Mr. CONGER. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he can gain nothing in pressing this bill by moving that the committee rise every time a gentleman wishes to speak on an amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I supposed that there has been long enough debate upon such a very fine point as this.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman mean to close debate upon the whole paragraph?

Mr. RANDALL. No, on the amendment.

Mr. HALE. There is no objection to that.

Mr. CONGER. I have no objection to closing debate on the amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Before the vote is taken I desire to modify my amendment. [Cries of "Regular order!"] I hope the House will allow me to modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has a right to modify his amendment.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I modify it by striking out the word "while" and add before "$1,200" the words "at the rate of;" so that it will read, "for a messenger's place while held by Sidney L. Willson, a disabled soldier, at the rate of $1,200 per annum."

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out in line 52 the words "during the session;" so that it will read: Twenty-three messengers at $125 per month each.

It seems to me that the compensation that is allowed by this bill to messengers is insufficient. These messengers by the provisions of this bill are to be paid only during the sessions of Congress, and it is a notorious fact that they have duties to perform here prior to the assembling of Congress at each session, and that they are also called upon to perform duties when the session has closed.

It should also be remembered that these messengers have no allowance for traveling expenses, no mileage allowed them. They simply draw pay at the rate of $125 per month during the session of Congress.

Now gentlemen will observe that the next session of Congress will last only three months. These messengers will be compelled to be here at least a month in advance of the opening of the session. They must travel from their homes, wherever their homesteads are, and they must remain here during the session and also remain here, according to custom, at least a month after the close of the session, and it is proposed that they shall simply be paid for the period of the session.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I have to say that it is not well to fill all the offices of this House and of the Senate with residents of the city of Washington. It is legitimate that citizens of Pennsylvania, New York, or Illinois may be appointed to these positions. It is better they should be. The compensation proposed by this bill is an insignificant and unworthy compensation. It is not enough; and I insist that the words "during the session" should be stricken out, and the bill will then only provide these officers with a just and reasonable compensation.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to a point of order. The heat of this Hall is very great, and the discomfort, under any circumstance. I respectfully ask for the reading of the last clause of the sixty-fifth rule of the House, and I ask that it be enforced.

The Clerk read as follows:

Smoking is prohibited within the bar of the House or the galleries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Doorkeeper will see that this rule is enforced.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I rise for the purpose of opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.] It will be found, by referring to that part of the bill in regard to messengers of the Senate as well as of the House, that the committee have raised their term of services for the short sessions to four months instead of three months.

The gentleman from Minnesota referred to the fact that the next session would only be of three months' duration. I call his attention to the fact that the last section of the bill, section 5, provides that the words "during the session as used in this act shall extend to and shall be construed to mean four months."

Heretofore, Mr. Chairman, it has been customary in the House and in the Senate to pay messengers from $1,440 to $1,800 a year; in other words, to pay them $2,880 and $3,600 for a Congress, the two sessions of which do not exceed ten months. They receive a salary ranging from $9.60 to $12.00 per day for the time they actually serve.

By reference to this bill it will be found that the clerks of committees, outside of the clerks of two or three committees of the House and Senate, receiving but four or five dollars per day, are to be paid for the session only. Why should we pay a higher compensation to the messengers of this House and of the Senate, a class of men who may be very respectable and very competent for the discharge of the duties of their position, but men that you can obtain without any trouble in any portion of the country or in this city? By this bill it is proposed to pay them a little more than $4 per day, or at the rate of $125 a month, and to pay them for one month more than the length of the session for which they are to serve. It is not necessary for them to be here more than a few days before the meeting of Congress, and as soon as Congress adjourns their duties will cease and they will be at liberty to go home.

I cannot see any good reason why we should pay them, in the aggregate, over $50,000 more than this bill provides for. The saving accomplished by this bill in this respect in the House of Representatives alone will be rising of $30,000, and in the Senate I suppose it will be at least $20,000, although I have not made a close calculation upon that point.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to know whether the effect of the change proposed by this bill in the payment of these men for the short session will not be to limit the employment to men who live here in the immediate neighborhood, in the District of Columbia? It will reasonably follow that those who are now employed and come here from different States of the Union, and are paid as high as fourteen or eighteen hundred dollars a year, will not come here for a short session of Congress, for which they are to be paid only $500, as proposed by this bill. The natural effect will be that only men who live in the immediate neighborhood of the place where Congress is in session will be employed or will accept employment under the terms proposed by this bill.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I did not give way to the gentleman to interject a speech in my remarks; I gave way for a question only. I do not think his objection is a good one at all. If men wish to come from Missouri, fifteen hundred miles, for these places, they are at liberty to do so, and they will receive $500 for four months, or rather for three months' session of Congress. We are not here to dispense charity, but to carry on the proper business of legislation, and to pay our employés a reasonable compensation.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the pending amendment is exhausted.

The question was taken on Mr. DUNNELL's amendment; and upon a division there were—ayes 57, noes 72.

Mr. DUNNELL. No quorum has voted.

The CHAIRMAN. No quorum having voted, the Chair will appoint tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. In that case I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BLACKBURN: The petition of citizens of Clark, Estill, and Madison Counties, Kentucky, for a post-route from Winchester, via Muddy Creek and Allensville pike, to the mouth of Red River, and the location of post-offices at Allensville, the mouth of Red River, and at Pinchem, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of the regents of the University of California, and of James Lick, Richard S. Floyd, and others, trustees of the James Lick fund at San Francisco. This petition shows that James Lick made the munificent donation of $700,000 for the purpose of erecting within the State of California a telescope superior to any ever yet made. This great gift, calculated so much to advance the interests of science everywhere and to reflect credit upon our whole country, is placed in the safe hands of the University of California, an institution of great merit and usefulness, and which gives fair promise to become to the Pacific what Harvard and Yale are to the Atlantic States. Considerable research has been made under the auspices of the trustees of the fund to find some proper elevation, with the best atmospheric conditions for the location of this observatory. Various points upon the Sierra Nevada Mountains and the Coast Range Mountains have been examined and tested and under the highest advice a mountain in Santa Clara County, California, has been selected as containing in the highest degree all the elements which go to make up a proper place for a great observatory and telescope. This mountain, however, is wild, covered with rock, chaparral, underbrush, entirely unfit for cultivation, is public land, and probably, under ordinary circumstances, will not be surveyed for a hundred years to come. It is waste, unproductive, of no value, except for this great scientific purpose. The trustees petition Congress that a bill may be passed making a donation of a certain amount of land on the summit of this mountain, and I think that Congress will not hesitate to make this grant. If the ordinary course of disposal of the public lands is taken, the amount of land they require cannot be obtained under any existing law, and if it could the delay for surveys, &c., will greatly hinder the realizing of the objects of the gift of Mr. Lick. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I venture to express the hope that that committee will give early consideration to the petition and to the bill which I shall introduce as soon as it is in order, and that they will make a favorable report thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON. I present the petition of William H. Patton, of Little Rock, Arkansas, late a captain in Company K, Fourth Arkansas Cavalry. The petition sets forth that on September 7, 1833, under the orders of Major General F. Steele, commanding the department of Arkansas, four companies of volunteer troops were mustered into the service to serve for one year or during the war; and that after having served about six months, the War Department disapproved the order under which this muster was made. The petition prays Congress to legalize the muster. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I rise to present a memorial and resolution recently adopted by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, touching the alleged imprisonment by the government of Great Britain of a naturalized citizen of the United States for an offense which there is no sufficient proof that he ever committed. I desire to have the memorial and resolution read, as presenting clearly and distinctly the circumstances of the case, for which prompt relief is asked of the Government of the United States, for the protection of one of its citizens from foreign oppression, by the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial and resolution will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, as petitioners, would respectfully represent that E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, is now held by the government of Great Britain as a prisoner for a political offense, which there is no proof that he ever committed.

Convicted with indecent haste upon testimony which even the law reporters for the British press felt constrained to protest against in a memorial to the English home office as lame, impotent, and inconclusive, the death penalty at first adjudged against him was changed to even a harsher doom: imprisonment for life.

It is an indisputable fact that Condon is a citizen of the United States, and as such has periled his life in defense of the Republic under that flag which we now invoke for his protection.

Your petitioners would respectfully insist that it is due to the dignity of the American Government, the honor of the American name, and the protection of the American citizen, that such measures at once be taken as will effect the release of our fellow-citizen, now languishing in a felon's cell because of an alleged political offense against a foreign power.

We ask for the Irish Condon the same decisive action which in the case of the Austrian Koszta won the plaudits of our people and extorted the admiration of the civilized world; action evidencing not only the power but the promptness of the American Government to protect American citizens from oppression wherever they might be.

We ask similar action to that by which the crew of the Virginius were rescued from Spanish prisons and indemnity coerced for the victims of Spanish butchery. Must we believe that it is because Spain is weak and Great Britain mighty the Department of State was so swift and bold as to the one and is so timid and tardy as to the other?

American citizenship is entitled to the protection of the American Government as well against the mighty as against the weak; and the same principles of honor and justice which required from Spain the surrender of the Virginius and its crew unite to make it imperative upon the American Government to demand of Great Britain the surrender of the American citizen, the American soldier, E. O'M. Condon.

And to this end we pray for such measures as Congress in its wisdom shall deem most appropriate and effective.

Resolution in relation to E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, imprisoned by the British government for a political offense.

Whereas information has reached this body that E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, is held in imprisonment by the British government for a political offense; and whereas a memorial from his fellow-countrymen, citizens of this State, has been presented in his behalf:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be directed and our Representatives requested to take such steps as in their judgment may be best to secure the interposition of the Federal Government in behalf of said prisoner and tend to his restoration to freedom and his return to his adopted country.

Resolved, That these resolutions, together with the memorial herewith, be printed, and that the governor be requested to forward copies of the same to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

W. J. STONE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JNO. C. UNDERWOOD,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved March 20, 1876.

JAMES B. McCREARY.

By the governor:

J. STODDARD JOHNSTON,
Secretary of State.

Mr. STEVENSON. I never heard of this case until I received this morning from the secretary of state of Kentucky the accompanying memorial and resolution requesting their presentation to the Senate. The memorial presents the facts upon which the resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky rests. I am quite sure I need say nothing of the importance of prompt action by the Government in ascertaining the facts touching the imprisonment of E. O'M. Condon, and taking such steps as the honor of the country shall require and the protection of one of its citizens from oppression and illegal incarceration shall demand. I have, as already stated, no knowledge personally of the facts set up in this memorial, and it would be, therefore, improper to comment on the facts set forth in the memorial until their truth shall be ascertaind. I have obeyed the mandate of my Commonwealth in bringing to the notice of the Senate this alleged imprisonment of one of our people, and I now ask the reference of the memorial and resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, where I am quite sure it will be promptly investigated.

Mr. SARGENT. There is almost an indecent reflection upon the State Department in the memorial. I do not wish for myself to have it understood that I concur in the justice or propriety, even in a petition, of such a reflection on a Department of the Government.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I present the memorial of the city council of Covington, Kentucky, asking the restoration of the military garrison and arsenal of the United States to Newport, Kentucky, from which place it was removed some months ago by the Secretary of War to Columbus, Ohio. I desire briefly to say a word or two on the justice and weight of the prayer of these memorialists. The garrison so recently removed from Newport, Kentucky, was established there, if I remember aright, something like seventy or eighty years ago. It is an admirable location for a military garrison and a recruiting depot.

The Government has erected valuable buildings there, and no point in the western country possesses, in my judgment, greater advantages as a military post or a recruiting depot. This cannot be gainsaid. This is proved by the fact of its continuance there for nearly a century. It is healthy; it is central; it is in the center of a large population, composed of the cities of Cincinnati, of Covington, and of Newport. It has the water-carriage of the Ohio, of the Mississippi, and of the other western rivers and their tributaries. It has the advantage of large and cheap markets, so important to the health and pocket of the soldiers. I do not know why the late Secretary of War thought it expedient to make this removal. I have seen no reasons for such action, and if the Secretary of War has given any, they have escaped my observation. I have heard it hinted that the motive of the removal was to obtain larger grounds. I do not know that this is true. Whenever it is made officially to appear that enlarged grounds was the sole object of that removal, I promise to expose its fallacy. The grounds at Newport could have been enlarged at little or no expense.

Mr. President, the people of Covington, of Newport, and I doubt not of Cincinnati, deemed the action of the late Secretary of War in making this removal an exceedingly unwise one. This removal must not only entail large expenditures of public money in the erection of buildings already possessed by the Government, but a large and increasing expenditure must be incurred in the transportation of all men enlisted in the Western, Southern, and Southwestern States, and even in the cities of Louisville, Newport, Covington, or Cincinnati, by rail from Newport to Columbus. Mr. President, it is not unnatural that the people of the three cities of Newport, Covington, (and I think I might add Cincinnati,) should feel a deep interest in the speedy restoration of the garrison at Newport. It has been a military post during every administration of the Federal Government, from the time of Jefferson or Madison till the past year. Many mellowed memories hang around it. How many brave soldiers have been enlisted there? How many distinguished officers of the Army, who, having given their lives to their country and now sleep from their labors, have commanded at that garrison? How many more, full of years and full of honors, look back with pleasure to the happy hours when they were located half a century ago at that old and pleasant garrison? When are estimated the many advantages of Newport over Columbus as a recruiting depot, I sincerely hope that the prayer of my constituents will be heard and granted. But I have said already more than I intended. This removal is demanded by the highest considerations of public policy and I hope will soon take place.

I now move the reference of this memorial to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON presented the memorial of Charles J. Franter and other workingmen of Kenton, Kentucky, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KELLY presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Portland, Oregon, praying for an appropriation to improve the Columbia and Willamette Rivers; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of workingmen of the City of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Clarion County, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Lancaster, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania; a petition of workingmen of Columbia, Lancaster County, Pennsylvania; two petitions of workingmen of Lehigh County; and two petitions of workingmen of the city of Philadelphia, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of 1,900 pensioners of the United States, citizens of the State of Pennsylvania, praying for a continuance of the present system of paying pensions; which was referred to the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

Mr. WALLACE presented a petition of workingmen of Philadelphia and a petition of workingmen of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Steam Navigation, remonstrating against any change in the present lighthouse system; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented additional papers relating to the claim of John Montgomery and Thomas E. Williams for damage of property in Virginia, near the end of the Long Bridge, during the late war; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MORTON presented a petition of workingmen of New Albany, Indiana, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in favor of the relief of settlers upon the Hastings and Dakota and the Southern Minnesota Railroad lands; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas a large number of people have settled upon what is known as contested land, within the land grant of the Hastings and Dakota and Southern Minnesota Railway Companies; and whereas these people settled in good faith upon said lands, having been permitted by the local land offices to file for pre-emption upon the same, and which local land offices now refuse to allow these settlers to make final proof, although the law for pre-emption of public lands has been complied with in every particular: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Senators and Representatives of this State in Congress be, and are hereby, requested to use their influence to secure such legislation as will provide for the relief of settlers upon contested lands within the grants of the Hastings and Dakota and Southern Minnesota Railway Companies.

Resolved, That the secretary of state is requested to forward copies of this resolution to each of our representatives in Congress.

J. B. WAKEFIELD,
President of the Senate.
W. R KENYON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved 4th March, A. D. 1876.

J. S. PILLSBURY,
Governor.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 26th day of March, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.]

J. S. IRGENS,
Secretary of State.

Mr. WINDOM presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, relative to patent-rights; which was referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the patent laws of the United States have been so devised and constructed as to shield and protect great and oppressive monopolies and to encourage gigantic speculations for the benefit of a few at the expense of the people, while they are totally inadequate to secure to inventors adequate compensation for their inventions: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Minnesota, That the Senators from this State in Congress are instructed and the Representatives are requested to use their earnest efforts to secure such amendments to said laws as will provide—

1. That any person may use any patented invention upon executing a bond in such sum and with such security as the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such use is to be made shall direct and approve, conditioned that he will pay to the owners of such invention a proper license fee for the use of the same, which bond shall be filed in the office of the clerk of said court.

2. That in all cases the measure of the license fee shall be such sum as will give the inventor reasonable compensation for his time, labor, ingenuity, and expense, which sum shall in no case exceed the fee fixed for such use in contracts made by the inventor or owner; and such license fee shall be the measure of damages in all actions and proceedings for the infringement of patents, and no other recovery for damages or profits shall be allowed.

J. B. WAKEFIELD.
President of the Senate.
W. R. KENYON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Approved March 3, 1876.

J. S. PILLSBURY.

STATE OF MINNESOTA,
Office of the Secretary of State:

I certify the foregoing to be a true and correct copy of the original on file in this office.

Witness my hand and the great seal of the State this 26th day of March, A. D. 1876.

[SEAL.]

J. S. IRGENS.
Secretary of State.

Mr. PADDOCK presented a memorial of a large number of citizens of the District of Columbia, remonstrating against the location of the Union Railroad of the District of Columbia, so far as its proximity to Boundary street is concerned; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. MCMILLAN presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in relation to obstructions to the navigation of the great lakes; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Minnesota, in relation to the construction of a bridge at Fort Snelling; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CONKLING presented a memorial of a large number of business men of the city of New York, remonstrating against the total repeal of the bankrupt law, and proposing amendments; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORTON. I present the memorial of a convention of delegates representing seven yearly meetings of the religious Society of Friends now in session in this city, in regard to Indian affairs. As this comes from a very highly respectable body of Christians, who for more than two hundred years have devoted themselves to the amelioration and civilization of the Indians, I ask that it may be read in the hearing of the Senate. It is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be read, if there be no objection.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the United States:

The memorial of a convention of delegates representing the seven yearly meetings of the religious Society of Friends, composed of citizens of the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa respectfully showeth that they have been actively engaged for several years in endeavoring to civilize the Indian tribes of the northern superintendency with marked success.

Believing that the proposed transfer of the care of the Indians to the War Department will be a serious injury to them, and no ultimate gain to the Government, we earnestly remonstrate against such change, and wish you to seriously consider whether true wisdom will not cause you to continue the present humane policy.

[Signed by direction of the convention of delegates.]

DILLWYN PARISH,
Secretary of Delegates.

The memorial was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. NORWOOD presented the petition of Thomas N. Pouttain, sr., of Georgia, praying to be indemnified for the loss of cotton seized by the United States authorities in 1863 and 1864; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. INGALLS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of James Dalton, late of Company K, Eighty-first New York Volunteers, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1810) granting a pension to Elizabeth R. Hall, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1992) granting an additional pension to Mary P. Abell, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 183) granting an increase of pension to John E. Wunderlin, late a private in the Thirty-third Regiment of New York Volunteer Infantry, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 539) to provide for an increase of pension in favor of Martin Kelly, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BOGY, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 178) to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the final adjustment of private land claims in the States of Florida, Louisiana, and Missouri, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1860, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 294) for the relief of Charles E. Hedges, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 253) granting a pension to Joseph B. Lane, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 118) granting a pension to James H. Woodard, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2306) granting a pension to John McIntire, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Maximillian Rosenberg, praying the pay and allowances of a second lieutenant of infantry from the 1st day of March, 1862, to the 15th day of September, 1862, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Horace L. Emery, praying for permission to go before the Commissioner of Patents to make application for an extension of his patent for improvement in cotton-ginning machines, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 675) enabling Horace L. Emery to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for an extension of letters-patent for improvement in cotton-ginning machines.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 373) to promote the efficiency of the light-house service of the United States, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of the State of Michigan in favor of an appropriation for a light-house and fog-bells at the west bar of Mackinaw Island, reported a bill (S. No. 676) authorizing the construction of a light-house and fog-bells on Round Island, Straits of Mackinaw; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 933) granting a pension to William D. Cobaugh, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the petition of David Klein, a citizen of New York City, praying to be allowed a royalty for the use by the United States authorities, as is alleged, of his patent for ponton-bridges, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of a number of citizens of the United States asking that the convention entered into for the establishment and maintenance of an international bureau of weights and measures may be ratified, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations; which was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 240) granting a pension to John A. Goedfrey, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Francis Bernard, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2291) granting a pension to John H. Garrison, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. SARGENT asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 677) granting a site for an observatory to the trustees of the Lick Observatory of the astronomical department of the University of California; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to introduce a joint resolution which probably affects the same gentleman referred to in the resolution and petition of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STEVENSON] this morning.

There being no objection, leave was granted to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 14) requesting the President to intercede with Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain for the release of Captain E. M. Condon, now confined in prison in Portland prison, England, under sentence for life; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to say that Captain Condon served in the Army during the war as a gallant soldier. He was located at Cincinnati, Ohio, and in 1867 he was called to England upon business, and having relatives in Manchester, England, he was there in October, 1867, at the time of the murder of Sergeant Brett. He and four others were arrested on the 27th or 28th day of October, 1867. They were hurriedly tried jointly, and sentenced to death about the 1st of November, 1867. One of the parties, Mr. Maguire, was a soldier in the British army; and he was pardoned. The sentence of Captain Condon was commuted to imprisonment for life, while Allen and Larkin and O'Brien were hanged. I think it is a case in which the Government of the United States should intercede to have him released. I move that the joint resolution be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On the 22d of this month I made an adverse report from the Committee on Claims on the memorial of Warren Mitchell, of Louisville, Kentucky, praying to have refunded to him the amount of proceeds of certain cotton belonging to him seized and sold by the Government of the United States and covered into the Treasury. The report was not acted upon by the Senate; but, on my motion, was laid on the table. I now, with the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Claims, move that the report and the memorial be taken from the table and recommitted to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WRIGHT. I will say in that connection that there are a great many matters which have been submitted to the Committee on Claims, and we are endeavoring, with such industry as we can, to dispose of those claims. It is occurring every day that we make reports here, and Senators, finding that either because the parties interested have not given attention or they themselves have forgotten what they have to do in connection with the claims, present propositions to have the reports recommitted. In this instance I make no objection, because I think the circumstances are special and peculiar; but I call the attention of Senators to the fact that these reports are being made; and, as far as we are concerned, at least as far as I am concerned, hereafter, unless there be special and peculiar reasons, I shall resist every proposition to recommit a report after it has been made, unless there be new evidence.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to recommit.

The motion was agreed to.

THE TRADE-DOLLAR.

Mr. SHERMAN. Senate bill No. 263 was reported two or three days ago from the Committee on Finance. If it is the pleasure of the Senate, I would like to have it taken up now. I do not wish to interfere with morning business, but I desire the bill acted upon.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If in order, I move to take up the motion submitted by me some days since for the reconsideration of the vote by which the bill was passed fixing the salary of the President of the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has just moved to proceed to the consideration of the bill he has named.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think it will take but a few minutes. It is very short.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the bill at length for information.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (S. No. 263) to amend the laws relating to legal tender of silver coin.

Mr. COCKRELL. I object to that bill. I should like it to lie over until we have an opportunity for the consideration of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think the Senator will object to it if he understands the precise nature of it.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am very decidedly a hard-money man; I bolieve in silver as a currency, and I should like to see it a legal tender for sums larger than $5. I am opposed to its being demonetized and driven out of the country.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator, I am sure, will not object to the bill when he hears it explained. It only changes the existing law in a very slight degree. At any rate, I should like to have it called up before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, the pending question being on the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and in lieu thereof insert:

That section 3586 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and hereby is, amended to read as follows:

The silver coins of the United States, except the trade dollar, shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $5 in any one payment.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the only change in the existing law proposed by this short bill is to except the trade-dollar from being a legal tender. By misadvertence, I imagine, in the revision of the statutes the trade-dollar was made a legal tender, while in fact the trade-dollar is simply a mercantile dollar, coined at the request of any holder of silver bullion for merchandise, intended to promote our trade with China. It is not proposed to interfere with that object of the trade-dollar which is coined now at the request of any holder of bullion who can have it converted into silver coin in this form. It was never the purpose to make it a legal tender in the payment of debts, because it was at the time it was issued considerably more valuable than gold.

Mr. MERRIMON. Why is the trade-dollar specially valuable for the trade with China? What is the difference between the trade-dollar and the ordinary dollar?

Mr. SHERMAN. The trade-dollar contains four hundred and twenty grains of standard silver. The dollar of the law contains four hundred and twelve and one-half grains of silver. The subsidiary coinage contains three hundred and eighty-five grains in two half-dollars. The trade-dollar was a dollar coined simply for the benefit of merchants in the foreign trade to compete with the Mexican dollar, which was a more valuable dollar than our legal-tender dollar. It was never intended to make it a legal tender. Now the result is, as silver has declined below the standard of gold, far below its former value, that private persons carry their silver bullion to the mints, and under the law as it now stands require it to be coined into trade-dollars, and then use them as a legal tender, silver being now depreciated below its legal standard.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would like to make one inquiry of the Senator from Ohio, whether the Committee on Finance in reporting this bill means to be understood by the Senate as opposing the proposition contained in the original bill of the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] to make the silver coins of the United States a legal tender to a larger amount than $5?

Mr. SHERMAN. We do not propose now to interfere with that question at all. That question is being considered by the Committee on Finance. Whether we will extend the limit of the legal-tender is now being considered in another way. It has no relation to this bill.

Mr. MITCHELL. A separate proposition?

Mr. SHERMAN. A separate proposition. The only question now is whether we will correct that misadvertence in revising the laws which made the trade-dollar a legal tender when it was not so designed.

The Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] thinks I have not explained the matter. I think I have. I will say further that the trade-dollar is issued at the request of private persons. When any holder of silver bullion desires to exchange it for trade-dollars, he can take it to the mints and ask that it be coined into trade-dollars; and then he sells them or uses them in the foreign trade, while the other silver coins of the United States are coined at the pleasure of the United States and only for their benefit, and whatever profit is derived from the other coinage is derived by the United States, and not by private individuals. But the trade-dollar is a mere article of merchandise. The Committee on Finance have considered the subject fully.

I will read the section under which the trade-dollar is issued. I will read, first, section 3513, in regard to the silver coins of the United States:

The silver coins of the United States shall be a trade-dollar, a half dollar, or fifty-cent piece, a quarter dollar, or twenty-five-cent piece, a dime, or ten-cent piece; and the weight of the trade-dollar shall be four hundred and twenty grains troy; the weight of the half dollar shall be twelve grams and one-half of a gram; the quarter dollar and the dime shall be, respectively, one-half and one-fifth of the weight of said half dollar.

Or, reduced to grains, two half dollars of the ordinary coinage contain three hundred and eighty-five grains. The trade-dollar is issued only under the circumstances stated in section 3520, which I will now read:

Any owner of silver bullion may deposit the same at any mint to be formed into bars or into dollars of the weight of four hundred and twenty grains troy, designated in this title as trade-dollars, and no deposit of silver for other coinage shall be received. Silver bullion contained in gold deposits and separated therefrom may, however, be paid for in silver coin at such valuation as may be, from time to time, established by the Director of the Mint.

The subsidiary coin is coined only by the United States in such quantities as are demanded for money. The trade-dollar is issued only as an article of merchandise, as a form of silver bullion, and therefore it ought not to be made a legal tender. There should be no question about that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If I understand the object of this bill—and I would like the chairman to tell me if I am correct—it is that whatever profit there may be from converting silver into coin shall accrue to the benefit of the United States, instead of to the benefit of individuals.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely it.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That certainly is right.

Mr. SHERMAN. Now, any profit accruing by the issuing of the trade-dollar goes to private individuals, and thus we lose all our control over our silver coinage. The proposition is so plain that I think further debate is unnecessary.

Mr. BOGY. I should prefer that the bill should go on the Calendar, as it will very properly bring up the question of making silver a legal tender for a larger amount than $5. The statement made by the Senator from Ohio is perfectly correct, and the correction which he proposes to make by this bill should be made, because, strictly speaking, the trade-dollar is not a coin of the United States. His statement in that respect is altogether correct, and the bill I presume is perfectly correct; but it will present in a very proper way the subject of making silver a legal tender to a larger amount.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that the Committee on Finance have a bill before them that is now being very fully considered in regard to that very point. This process of converting silver bullion into trade-dollars is pushed forward by persons interested in it, and thus the United States are deprived of their control of the silver coinage of the United States. This bill ought to pass immediately. As to the other question, it is a much broader question, and is now being considered by the Committee on Finance, and will be reported upon as soon as we are ready.

Mr. BOGY. I cannot see the bad effect of the present law, although I admit that what is called the trade-dollar is not, strictly speaking, a legal-tender coin. Although it is so, perhaps, by section 3513, yet if you will look at section 3520 you will see that it was not the intention. There is an error manifestly.

Mr. SHERMAN. An error in revising the statutes.

Mr. BOGY. And it should be corrected. Nevertheless, I think the whole subject had better be brought up, and I cannot see that any great harm can result by this law remaining as it is for a short time longer. If parties who own bullion desire to have it coined into trade-dollars, there can be no harm, and the export of that coin cannot hurt anybody, because it is of no use in this country, not being a legal tender.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is a legal tender now.

Mr. BOGY. Only to the amount of $5, which is next to nothing at all, and in point of fact amounts to nothing. I am perfectly satisfied myself that we ought to make silver a legal tender to a larger amount. I do not think that silver should be made a legal tender to an amount unlimited as gold is, because, not being as valuable as gold, it would drive gold away; but I am fully impressed with the conviction that the amount of silver which should be made a legal tender ought to be increased to at least $1,000, and in that way we should be doing what is being done in France and other countries where the double standard is maintained. The silver would become the coin of the people, and be used in all small transactions, and gold would be used for banking transactions.

This involves the consideration of the great question as to the relative value of silver and gold. That is a question which has to be examined very carefully and very scientifically. I do not propose to go into that question at all just now; nor am I prepared to say what is the exact proportion; but admitting that that proportion can be ascertained, (as it can be, and ascertained beyond a doubt,) I can see no reason why silver should not be made a legal tender, but I can see many reasons why it should be made a legal tender.

Then, again, in my opinion it involves a great constitutional question. As it is now, the States have the right to make gold and silver a legal tender, and nothing but gold and silver; therefore it is competent for one or for all the States to say that silver shall be a legal tender without any limit whatsoever, because the inhibition of the Constitution is that no State shall make anything a legal tender but gold and silver. That being so, they then can make gold and silver a legal tender without any limit whatever. If all the States were to make silver a legal tender equal to gold, it would become the legal tender for the United States; and it would not be competent for the Federal Government to restrain the action of the States. It therefore involves a grave constitutional question, besides a financial question. I have thought a great deal upon this subject, and I am not able to see any good reason why silver should not be made a legal tender to a very large amount, say a thousand dollars; but I see a great many good reasons why it should be so.

I shall not on this occasion detain the Senate to discuss the subject. I intend doing so at a future time, and I would much prefer that all bills having a bearing on the subject should, for a while, go on the Calendar, so as to bring up the whole subject to the mind of the Senate in a proper manner.

Mr. SARGENT. The original bill referred to the committee was introduced by myself and provided for a greater legal tender of silver coin. It is a question beset with difficulties, and I do not know that my mind is entirely clear as to the extent to which silver coin should be made a legal tender; but I am very positive upon one proposition, and that is that if silver coin is a legal tender to any extent, it ought to be within the control of the Government to coin it on its own account. Your silver coin becomes abraded. Who shall redeem it? As it is now, the Government does it on account of the large profit it makes in coining the silver coinage. Obviously, it should do so. But the trade-dollar is without a father; the Government is under no obligation to redeem that. It simply takes bullion of any one, puts it in a certain form, and stamps it. The trade-dollar is of higher value than the subsidiary silver coinage for which the Government is responsible. The stamp is put on the trade-dollar according to the law, which requires that a certain amount shall be in it in order that the stamps may go on it; but there is no margin to the Government at all. It receives the mere cost of that coinage, and cannot be called on to redeem that coin when it becomes abraded. The question of the abrasion of coin is a very important one to the commercial classes in my State, both as to our silver and our gold coin. We have been trying for some time to secure legislation in reference to the gold coin that would bring it up to the true standard, because the abrasion in actual use has been so great that if a strict discount were made in business transactions on that amount there would be considerable depreciation. Who shall lose the difference between standard and naturally abraded coin? If the holder, he suffers for all abrasions before made by others and by the Government in handling it for years. The question is, as I say, important.

In the silver coinage the Government has always recognized this duty on account of the profit it makes on it, and the difference between its real value and nominal value induces the Government to keep good the silver coinage; but in reference to the trade-dollars nothing of the kind can occur. You cannot call on the Government for that. It is like the stamp it puts on a bar of bullion, stamping it at the time it passes through its hands as worth a thousand dollars or $500, but it is not responsible for it six months thereafter when it may have passed from hand to hand or been filed or mutilated. In reference to the trade-dollar, its stamp carries no higher meaning or responsibility than that on the bar of bullion.

That which we are trying to remedy in this matter is a local trouble which has arisen among the people of the Pacific coast. They have in their hands, which they have bought of the Government, paying gold for, some millions of silver subsidiary coinage. They are not able to procure a dollar of that silver subsidiary coinage from the Government except by paying its full value in gold. The Government came in then, and while providing for a trade-dollar which was to facilitate our commerce with China, declared it should be a legal tender for $5; that is to say, it put it in a clause which when read altogether subjected this coin to the condition of the subsidiary silver coinage, without remembering that this was not a natural coin of the Government; that it put no seigniorage on it at all and made no profit on it. It simply stamps it, for the accommodation of the parties who have silver bullion, to give it currency in China. As soon as this was discovered, parties threw their bullion in immense quantities into the mints to have it coined in this trade-dollar form; they threw it out on the market, and therefore began depreciating the millions of subsidiary silver coinage which men had paid gold for and were using in all the avocations of life. The result was that complaint came from workmen that they were paid in this depreciated silver coinage; they could not pay their bills with it to the amount of over $5. We are thus finding the effects of a depreciated currency where we have stood for hard currency all the way along. The difficulty was in giving the legal-tender quality to an article which was not coined on Government account, and the amount of the coinage of which the Government cannot regulate. In reference to the subsidiary silver coinage the Government has the power in its hands to regulate it, to prescribe that not more than a certain amount shall go out, and only under conditions that keep it equal for business purposes with gold.

Mr. BOGY. What does the Senator mean by "subsidiary silver coinage?"

Mr. SARGENT. I mean halves and quarters, all the silver coin which is issued by the Government except the trade-dollar—the ten-cent piece, the five-cent piece, and the three-cent piece are included.

The former American dollar, which is less than the value of the gold dollar, the Government made its profit on, as it does on the two halves; but it is not now in circulation nor is it much called for, on account of its bulk. The half dollar is as large a silver coin as men ordinarily want to carry.

The incongruity, so far as the currency is concerned, is that the two half dollars are not of the value of the trade-dollar; and the moment you issue the dollar in this form it brings down necessarily in proportion the two half dollars below the standard; and if you turn the whole bullion mines of the Pacific coast into our mints, and coin them into trade-dollars, and make them a legal tender, you necessarily derange the character of the subsidiary silver coinage for which gold has been paid. The inconvenience has been felt by the people of my State and the State of Nevada. It is simply a local grievance. If you had gold and silver coinage in Ohio and Missouri, you would find it there.

Of course, if trade-dollars were coined only on Government account and issued at the mints in exchange for gold, that would remedy the difficulty I have mentioned; but merchants could not afford to export them, and the original object would be defeated.

The course of trade will soon relieve the market of trade-dollars, and restore the tone of the money market and the value of subsidiary coin, if this bill is passed. The relief will be easy and natural, by sending trade-dollars abroad to China, provided the issue for the purpose of circulation among ourselves is stopped. That, after a while, will cure the evil.

Mr. BOGY. The trouble on this question I think comes in this way: There is no law now fixing the relative value as between silver and gold. The silver coinage is not uniform. You have the trade-dollar, of four hundred and twenty grains troy, and then you have the half dollar, which is measured in French grams not grains, creating a confusion, and the relative value has never been fixed. If the coinage of silver was uniform from the dollar down to the five-cent piece of proper standard, (which standard of course I am not able to state now,) and fixing the value as between silver and gold there would be no trouble at all. The trouble is, in this case, that we, by the act of 1873—and I think without much consideration, because I have been unable to find much discussion on the subject—demonetized silver entirely excepting to the extent of $5, which really amounts to nothing at all. I think it is the greatest subject that can be discussed by the Senate with reference to the important question of resumption.

All nations are using gold coin at the present day pretty much, excepting France and a few of the southern peoples of Europe, who are using yet the double standard. I say, and am perfectly convinced of the fact, that we in this country could most advantageously use silver as coin, provided the relative value as between that and gold is scientifically and justly fixed by law. Now, you have a trade-dollar of four hundred and twenty grains troy, which contains more silver in proportion than the half dollar, or quarter, or ten-cent or five-cent piece. As a matter of course, the smaller coin, which my friend calls the subsidiary coin, is depreciated, and persons who are compelled to receive their pay in silver to the extent of $5 do not like to take a coin which is of less purity than the silver dollar. But that is owing to the fact that the coinage is not uniform; it is owing to the fact that the same character of purity does not extend down from the dollar to the five-cent piece; and it is owing to the further fact that the relative value as between silver and gold has not been fixed. Whenever you have fixed the value as between silver and gold, and fixed that properly, whatever that may be, there can be no flood of silver, because it will be just as good as gold, and yet it is not intrinsically as valuable as gold; and to that extent perhaps it would be wise to limit its legal-tender capacity. It formerly was without limit; and we all remember the day when silver was the coin of this country—I may say entirely—and gold was used as a sort of metallic merchandise. The act of 1873 demonetized silver in this country; and, as I said in the speech I had the honor to make some time ago on that very subject, we blindly followed the lead of Great Britain, and yet our position is just the reverse of the position of Great Britain.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to ask him or some other Senator a question? Is it true that there is now by law no American dollar; and if so, is it true that the effect of this bill is to be to make half dollars and quarter dollars the only silver coin which can be used as a legal tender?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the Senator from New York that since the law of 1853 the use of the silver whole dollar has been discontinued and none has been issued. That has been so since 1853.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there power to issue it?

Mr. SHERMAN. There is no power and has been none.

Mr. BOGY. The power to issue existed from 1853 to 1873; but since 1873 I think there has been no power.

Mr. SHERMAN. There has been no silver dollar issued since 1853, and my impression is that the law of 1853 did not confer the power to issue it. The Senator thinks it did confer the power; but the law of 1873 cut off the power, in my judgment, if it existed. The dollar was practically dropped from our coinage system for the best possible reason, the same reason that the five-franc piece and the large coins of England have been dropped out of their currency, simply because it is inconvenient in size and form for ordinary coinage and ordinary business.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Allow me to suggest that the reason the dollar was dropped and that no such silver coin has been coined since 1853 is because silver was at a premium at the then established ratio of gold, and nobody had any inducement to coin the silver dollar at that time. The law, however, authorized the coinage of the silver dollar then, and it was never demonetized until February, 1873; but it needed no law to prevent people from coining such a dollar for use in business, when there was another dollar to be got 3 or 4 per cent. cheaper. The people did in 1853 and up to 1873 have an option that if gold should become dearer they could fall back again on the silver dollar. In 1873 that privilege was taken away.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a bill now pending before the Committee on Finance to authorize and prescribe a dollar of the weight and fineness of two half dollars of what is now called our subsidiary silver coinage. That bill will be acted upon as soon as we can get the requisite information. That bill also seeks somewhat to change the law in regard to the amount for which silver shall be a legal tender. That is not this bill at all, nor does it have any effect on this bill. This bill simply excepts from the legal-tender authority the trade-dollar, which is simply a dollar coined for the benefit of merchants, not coined by the United States in any case.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the reason for eliminating the trade-dollar?

Mr. SHERMAN. That was provided for as a mere matter of convenience to merchants to enable them to convert their bullion into a trade-dollar for exportation to China, where the old pillar-dollar of Mexico had possession of the channel of trade, and the trade-dollar was a little more valuable than the Mexican pillar-dollar, in order to drive out of circulation the Mexican pillar-dollars in China and Japan. For that reason the trade-dollar is a convenient way of exporting silver bullion.

Mr. McDONALD. Permit me to ask the Senator from Ohio whether we have any law on the subject of the silver coinage of the United States except section 3513 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. SHERMAN. I read that section.

Mr. McDONALD. Is not that the only law we have defining the present silver coins of the United States?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir. I read that.

Mr. McDONALD. Does not that leave out the old standard dollar entirely?

Mr. SHERMAN. Undoubtedly; but I say there has been none coined since 1853. The question of restoring that dollar is a question that is not in this bill at all.

Mr. McDONALD. Then the legal-tender act passed in 1873 applies to all silver coin?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDONALD. And limits the tender to the value of $5?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McDONALD. And the purpose of this bill, as I understand it, is to strike out the trade-dollar from that provision?

Mr. SHERMAN. From the legal tender, simply because the trade-dollar is a mere form of bullion issued only on the demand of merchants and private citizens, and not for the interest of the United States.

Mr. McDONALD. So I understand; and it is legalized by the first section referred to, declaring it to be one of the silver coins of the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. And the reason why it was inserted in this provision was because at the time it was issued it was worth two or three cents more than gold, and it was put among the silver coins for that reason. I again repeat that there is nothing in this bill except the exception of the trade-dollar from the legal tender; and that if this exception is not made, any private citizen can control the silver coinage of the United States by carrying silver bullion to the mints and demanding that it be coined into trade-dollars, now of less value than gold. It is manifest that this ought to be repealed, and the other questions that are spoken of by Senators will then properly come for consideration.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask a question?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Why not remedy this difficulty by beginning at the other end? The trade-dollar approaches much more nearly the standard of gold value than our other silver coinage. It is therefore certainly better as a legal tender for the use of the people. The objection I understand to that is that it is coined without charging seigniorage. Why not from this time charge that seigniorage instead of beginning at the other end?

Mr. SHERMAN. When we issue a dollar we must issue it at the same value as two half dollars or four quarter dollars or ten ten-cent pieces.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Not if we provide otherwise.

Mr. SHERMAN. But you must make them all alike. You make two half dollars equivalent to a dollar, and four quarters equivalent to a dollar. You cannot adopt a coinage in which the largest coin is worth more in proportion than the others. The trade-dollar was never intended for circulation; it was simply intended for export.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Is it not now a legal tender to the amount of $5?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, it was made so, probably by mistake; but at the time the trade-dollar was provided for, the trade-dollar was worth more than the gold dollar.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. And is now much nearer the gold value than the other coinage.

Mr. SHERMAN. The trade-dollar is now from ninety-five to ninety-six cents in gold.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope this matter may be disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I should like to say a word or two on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the consideration of this bill?

Mr. MORTON. I am satisfied that this matter will lead to discussion.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I wish to make an explanation.

Mr. MORTON. Very well.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. In order to monetize silver, or declare the double standard, or carry out the views of the Senator from Missouri, it would be necessary to have a bill that should be harmonious in all its parts. This measure is designed only to protect the people of the Pacific coast, who are on a gold basis, from severe aberrations in the price of silver. They have been obliged to use a subsidiary or small coinage to make change with. In that small coinage the two half dollars contain but three hundred and eighty-five grains of silver; the trade-dollar contains four hundred and twenty grains of silver; but for the reason that the two half dollars were necessary and very convenient and portable, and were made a legal tender to the amount of $5, for the amount that was necessary to make the change of that community, sufficient of this debased coinage could be sold for gold and kept at a parity with gold because it cost gold and was necessary to make change with, and it did not disturb the relations between the retail and wholesale dealer of the Pacific coast. The trade-dollar was made when it was 2 or 3 per cent. premium over gold, but by a decline in silver the trade-dollar now is worth ninety-two, ninety-three, or ninety-four cents in gold. By having the trade-dollar a legal tender for $5, the full amount that the subsidiary coins are now a legal tender for, the effect is to degrade the two half dollars that had cost the citizen there $1 in gold, and upon which he was doing business. It degrades that subsidiary coin to the bullion value of the trade-dollar.

Mr. BOGY. Because it is not as pure as the trade-dollar; because it does not contain as much pure silver.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. It takes it to the level of the trade-dollar. The subsidiary coin does not go below the trade-dollar, but nobody is going to use a subsidiary coin sold by the Government for gold when he can buy the bullion at its bullion value and get it coined at his own option at the Mint. Therefore it degrades the coinage.

Mr. BOGY. I will ask the Senator is the half dollar as pure as the trade-dollar?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. It is as pure, nine-tenths fine, but is not half as heavy. The two half dollars contain three hundred and eighty-five grains of standard silver. A half dollar, supposing it were made on the basis of the trade-dollar, would contain two hundred and ten grains of standard silver. Therefore I say that, silver having fallen in value, the business of that community being done on a coin basis, and you allowing persons to buy silver and themselves take it to the Mint, the effect is to destroy the value of the four or five millions of subsidiary coins already purchased from the Government for gold at their nominal rate, dollar for dollar. It reduces the value of all subsidiary coins to the present bullion value of silver, and therefore disarranges the trade between wholesale and retail dealers, much to the inconvenience of the people of that coast. They have neither the one thing nor the other. They are on a gold basis for large transactions and on a silver basis without a scientific relation having been established by the Government between gold and silver for the subsidiary coin.

Then, while I am in favor absolutely of monetizing silver, while I am in favor of the double standard, yet I think it would be the height of wisdom to pass this measure, in order that the business of that coast may not be disturbed until such relation can be established and until we shall ordain some law here that gold and silver shall pass concurrently. This is absolutely needed on that coast because it is impossible to do business as at present neither on the one basis nor on the other. The subsidiary coins issued by the Government will pass if the privilege to private citizens to take their silver to the Mint and have it coined is taken away, or at least if the legal-tender clause in the bill authorizing it is taken away. Then the subsidiary coin will pass on a parity with gold, and hereafter on another occasion it will be time enough to introduce bills, and advocate them, restoring the silver dollar and declaring the double standard.

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend from Nevada allow me to ask a question? I am very much struck by his explanation, which I understand to be this: that, inasmuch as the subsidiary silver coinage can only be obtained by paying gold for it, if you allow the trade-dollar to be used as a legal tender, which is worth less than gold, you have operated an injury on those who pay gold for the subsidiary silver coinage.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. That is exactly the proposition.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to ask the Senator whether in actual business $100 in half dollars will buy $100 in gold in San Francisco?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Undoubtedly, until this occurred. The legal-tender clause applied to the trade-dollar has already had the effect of degrading the subsidiary coins. The stream cannot rise above its source. Heretofore they passed concurrently with gold; that is the fact.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator suppose that if the clause making the trade-dollar a legal tender were repealed, then in ordinary business $100 in silver would buy $100 in gold?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Without doubt, because the coins are being continually used up, lost, and all that sort of thing; and they must have change. It is necessary to do the business of the country; and no more of the subsidiary coins will be purchased for gold than will pass parallel with gold. What motive is there for anybody paying gold for a subsidiary coin when it is worth less than gold?

Mr. BOGY. With the proper value fixed between gold and silver, will not silver be taken as readily as gold?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. I think so.

Mr. BOGY. Will not $100 of silver procure $100 of gold?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Undoubtedly.

Mr. BOGY. The trouble now is from the want of uniformity in the coinage, owing to the fact that the trade-dollar has one standard of purity and the other has a different standard?

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Not that alone. The subsidiary coinage is only issued by the Government for gold, while the trade-dollar is issued to whoever holds silver bullion, so that any person who desires to do so can purchase silver at its bullion value and turn it into a legal tender.

Mr. BOGY. That is true, but it comes back to the original proposition, if your subsidiary coin was as pure as the other dollar there would be no harm in issuing it for gold.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. It is not necessary to enter into the reasons for debasing the subsidiary coin. When the relations between gold and silver were established—sometimes gold being above and sometimes below silver—when they were established, not scientifically as the gentleman wants them established, it was found frequently that if you made the subsidiary coins of equal value to the trade-dollar, if you did not degrade them at all, then a little rise in the price of silver destroyed all your subsidiary coinage. Bullion-dealers bought them up and put them in the melting-pot, and the people of the country were not able to get small change.

Mr. BOGY. There could be no rise in silver if you established the relative value by law based on a certain purity of coinage.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. On the contrary, I will state to my friend that under the double standard in France three times in fifty years did the relative value of gold and silver change. Why? Because the legal-tender value of gold in the country was greater than its bullion value, and therefore silver went out and vice versa. So it was three different times.

Mr. BOGY. That was owing to the fact that the legal-tender capacity was changed.

Mr. JONES, of Nevada. Not at all. No legal-tender capacity was changed at all. The market value of bullion changed, because of the great expense and the great time necessary for subsidiary coinage where the subsidiary metal was a little debased and the issue limited. Nobody would pay a gold dollar for two silver half dollars if they would not buy gold again.

Mr. BOGY. There is no difference to-day in France between gold and silver taken at the value fixed by law. The trouble here heretofore has been under the act of 1853 that we had fixed a lower standard than France for silver, and the consequence was silver went to France. By the act of 1853 there was no limit to the coinage of silver dollars. There were none coined in point of fact, but the law did authorize the coinage of silver dollars until 1873. Now there is no law authorizing the coinage of silver dollars, excepting it be the trade-dollar.

Mr. MORTON. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution relative to the Mississippi election.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that I will call this bill up to-morrow morning.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps;

A bill (H. R. No. 2300) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress;" and

A bill (H. R. No. 2817) to regulate the pay and allowances of Army officers.

The message also announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution relative to the distribution of the reports of the United States geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, published in accordance with acts approved June 23, 1874, and February 15, 1875.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 359) to incorporate the Washington City Inebriate Asylum in the District of Columbia; and

An act (S. No. 490) for the relief of Hibben & Co., of Chicago, Illinois.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON December 15, 1875, as modified by him on the 27th instant, namely:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi (in 1875) for members of Congress and State officers and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds committed upon and violence exercised toward the colored citizens of that State and the white citizens disposed to support their rights at the election, and especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting, or compelled to vote, contrary to their wishes, for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise, as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, thus practically denied and violated, and that such intimidation has been since continued for the purpose of affecting future elections; and whereas the people of all the United States have an interest in and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of these allegations, and to inquire how far these constitutional rights have in the said election been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation, and to inquire and report to the Senate, before the end of the present session, whether any, and, if so, what, further legislation is necessary to secure to said colored citizens the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights; and that said committee be empowered to visit said States, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony on oath, and to use all necessary process for these purposes.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, on comparison of the original resolution with the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan and accepted by the Senator from Indiana, relating to the proposed inquisition into the affairs of the State of Mississippi, I conclude there is between the two little or no difference. In truth, there is in the original resolution of the Senator from Indiana a reference to the election of a Senator of the United States which would seem to me to give the only color of justification to a proceeding of this kind; for there is an undoubted constitutional warrant for the Senate of the United States, as for the House of Representatives, to pass upon the elections, qualifications, and returns of members of the respective bodies; and, therefore, if there was any suggestion that this touched the election of a Senator, there might be on that ground some color of right for the appointment of a senatorial committee. But that is stricken from the resolution offered by the Senator from Michigan; and, therefore, we are to consider the resolution as it now stands. This would seem to be unusual and unprecedented in many respects. In the first place it is a Senate resolution. It calls for the appointment of a committee of five Senators. No reference is made to the existence of the co-ordinate branch of Congress; and yet the resolution proposes that this committee shall report to the Senate what "further legislation" may be necessary to enforce certain amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. President, when four years ago there was an allegation of the necessity for inquisition into the affairs of the Southern States generally, a committee was appointed for the purpose of preparing legislation of a coercive character; but it was a joint committee of members of the two Houses, the proportion of members being retained upon the committee. I was assigned to duty upon that committee, and took part in its labors, both in the original committee and in the subcommittees formed under its authority. I may well ask now, and I think it is a point to be noted, why is it when legislation is proposed as the result of this inquisition that you exclude the co-ordinate branch of Congress from being represented upon the committee? Is it intended to make legislation fitted for present affairs and conducive to present ends? Then as practical men you must consider the entire authority in whom the power to enact this legislation is reposed. If it be the design of the friends of this resolution that it shall be carried into effect, then they must provide such legislation as will be acceptable to the co-ordinate branch of Congress. Unless the measures of this body shall meet the approval and consent of the co-ordinate branch, the action of this body will be in vain. Therefore I say it is a strange commentary upon the present resolution that it excludes the other branch of Congress from the investigation which is proposed to be the basis of law, which law never can be enacted without the consent of the branch that is thus excluded from the investigation which is to permit the law to be enacted. Furthermore, this resolution commits this whole subject to five Senators, who are to report to the Senate before the end of the present session, so that it is intended that there is to be legislation by the present Congress; and the anomalous fact is presented that in contemplated legislation by the two branches of Congress, the Senate knowing that there is a difference in political party opinions between the two Houses, they exclude the House of Representatives from all participation in that which is intended to be the basis of legislation by both Houses. If it were intended to be the basis of law, then the information sought for should be obtained by a joint committee, as it has been always heretofore.

The resolution not only confines this committee to five Senators, but it proposes that the Senators shall examine into the election of members of Congress in the State of Mississippi. It is alleged that the late election in Mississippi in 1875 for members of Congress was characterized by great frauds. Here, then, we have the assumption upon the part of the Senate to examine into the election of members of Congress, which power and duty is confided by the Constitution to the House of Representatives alone, each House being the sole judge of the election, qualification, and return of its own members. Not only does it invade the privileges of the House, excluding them and their committees from this investigation upon a subject-matter committed to their sole and exclusive control, but it proceeds to examine into the facts attending the election of "State officers and members of the Legislature" of the State of Mississippi. This is a proposition never before advanced in the Senate. On the contrary, I have been a witness oftentimes to the declarations of Senators, and especially of the Senator from Indiana, to the fact that the Senate must pause upon the threshold of the Legislature of a State, and are forbidden to enter into an examination of the qualification or election of those members, because, by the constitution of the States the two houses of each Legislature constitute the sole judges of the election, qualification, and returns of the members of that legislature. Here we have two clear invasions without precedent confided by the Constitution and our system of government to other bodies than this, and yet proposed to be conducted by this body separate and apart, without consultation with those who are to be affected by our action, and who must concur in the action of the Senate in order to give any force to it at all.

Another question might be propounded. Who has asked for this committee? What is its origin? Have petitions been presented from the State of Mississippi? Not one. Is any one here contesting the seat of the Senator-elect? No one. His credentials have been before this body, and are on file in the office of the Secretary, and are regular in form. No one is here to contest his right, and the strongest prima facie case exists when the time shall come for him to make his appearance and claim a seat. Is it proposed to try his right in his absence? Is it proposed to estop him by proof taken without notice to him or his knowledge? I can scarcely imagine this resolution would reach that point; and yet, if it is intended that this election shall be hereafter questioned, all I can say is that the resolution is improper in form and premature as to the time. Should there be hereafter a just cause to consider the legality of this election, I shall then consider myself bound to all the carefulness, the abstinence from partisan opinion, of a judge upon the bench, and I shall then hold myself ready to pass upon the qualification and returns and the proper election of any one who may present himself here as a Senator-elect from the State; but until that time does come I do not propose to make myself a party in the pre-examination of this case and the prejudgment of the right to a seat in this body.

Mr. President, I regret exceedingly the introduction of this measure, not only in its original form, but quite as much so in its present modification, and I regret that it has met the approval of so calm and judicial a mind as that of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.] It has been to me a matter of surprise that he should have found (that which I have no doubt he believes he has found) constitutional warrant for the measure which he proposes. Whether he would have drawn this resolution if the late decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States had been known to him, I doubt, because I believe that a careful analysis of the results of those decisions would have assured him of the more than doubtful validity of any such attempts as are now proposed in the way of legislation to enforce the provisions of the constitutional amendments in question.

Mr. President, this resolution is a claim for the exercise of congressional power to interfere with the elections or the result of elections in a State. It is fraught with danger to the public peace and destructive of our federal system of Government. By this it is proposed to continue and expand a coercive system of centralized power in substitution for our American system of voluntary local self-government. Since the close of the war in 1865 this character of legislation has been unhappily adopted, and its operations have done more, in my opinion, to keep alive the ill-feeling and excitement generated by war between the people of the sections and the misunderstanding of their mutual feelings and interests and duties, than all other causes combined. The powers thus given to the officers of the United States have been grossly abused, and in many cases for the worst personal and party ends.

Why, sir, when one considers the mere money cost of these enforcement acts since their passage he will be shocked and surprised, and the country must be relieved by a decision which, if it did nothing else, saves the enormous outlays of money which were made under color of enforcing this law. Mr. President, remembering as I do the appropriations of money to support the so-called "Department of Justice" and to carry these enforcement laws into rigorous effect all over the country, I am shocked to think of the burdens so unnecessarily laid upon the people. Without having the figures before me, and desiring to keep entirely within a moderate estimate, I think I may truly say that millions upon millions, tens of millions of the money wrung by taxation from the people of this country have been expended to carry into effect these enforcement laws of Congress. Under the administration of the late Attorney-General Williams I forget the vast sums which were expended in North Carolina, in Arkansas, and other portions of the country, utterly disproportionate to the expenses in the State of New York, or Pennsylvania, or Ohio. The public documents, however, of that day disclose the truth; but what I have said with regard to the frightful aggregate of expenditure is literally and simply true.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator yield for an inquiry? I understood him to say that tens of millions had been wrung by taxation from the people and expended for the execution of the so-called enforcement acts.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes; I think so.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Does the Senator know of any appropriations, single or many, amounting to tens of millions of dollars, or even to a single ten million dollars?

Mr. BAYARD. I will give the Senator the figures after I get through my speech. I do say to him——

Mr. BOUTWELL. I only desire to call the attention of the Senator to his statement now, because I think if it can be sustained we shall ask for the figures.

Mr. BAYARD. My statement will be very moderate, and I propose to sustain it. I have not the figures before me; but I think the Senator will be fully gratified by the results that I shall show him. There has been a most monstrous outpouring of the public funds, spent by deputy marshals numbered by tens of thousands through the southern country, by marshals who traversed the State of North Carolina with blank writs in their pockets to arrest and drag from their homes men for the purpose of making fees. All these are facts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. It will also be shown, whenever there is full inquiry made into this business, that whatever money was expended in those States for the execution of the so-called enforcement laws was money expended under the law for the protection of a people who were trampled under foot by the political associates of the Senator from Delaware, and that it was only an effort in behalf of human rights and equality of political rights.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I congratulate the Senator that he has succeeded in injecting into my speech, under the pretense of asking me a question, a simple little bit of his same political tirade which I have listened to often before. If he is satisfied with that honor he is welcome to it. I know that of which I speak. I was a member of the committee who did go to the Southern States and who knew something of the system of this enforcement of the laws, and I say it was not only a cruel enforcement but it was most shockingly expensive to the Government and people of the United States; that under the pretext of enforcing this law and of protecting personal liberty the most outrageous crimes were committed. Spies were employed by thousands. Look at the history to-day of the detective Whitley, running through the Southern States for the purpose of creating the very crimes which he afterward proposed to punish. I remember it all. All these things passed under my observation when I was upon this committee; and the report of the minority sent here to the Senate and the House will disclose the truth of what I have said. I merely repeat that, if nothing but the money-cost alone to the people be considered, these enforcement laws have been a great cause of suffering to the people of this country.

But, sir, it was not simply the money. The effects were worse than that. The power of intimidation confided thus to unworthy agents under these laws and used for party, political, and personal ends has cost this country much; it has done much to destroy that feeling of good citizenship and love of this Government which is after all our best security for peace and for prosperity. Sir, the class of men who flourished under these laws were petty tyrants and oftentimes men of the most infamous character. The powers they exerted were utterly undue and exerted for the sorrow and suffering of the people among whom they lived and the disgrace of the Government that intrusted them with such powers. How many men have been imprisoned; how many to-day languish in prison under judgments which, under this last decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, if it have the meaning which I believe it does have, must be declared to have been invalid! How many fines have been extorted from men illy able to bear them, which I trust yet will be brought before Congress for repayment, because the laws under which they were enforced will be adjudicated to have been unconstitutional and void!

No, Mr. President, the fruits of such legislation have been only natural; they have been loss, sorrow, and suffering; they have been destruction of that spirit of love of country which is, after all, the best and the surest guarantee we have for prosperity and for peace. At last, however, Mr. President, these laws have been brought to the touchstone of judicial construction. At last they have reached the court of last resort in this country, and have been tested by the constitutional limitations upon the power of Congress; and I say that, by my construction of the decisions of the Supreme Court now before me, in the time that I have been enabled to give to them, I consider that substantially the enforcement act of 1870, which is proposed to be followed in kind by the present resolution, has been declared to be without constitutional warrant, and that the "appropriate legislation," whatever that may be, has never yet been enacted by Congress.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him one question? Does not the Supreme Court of the United States in that Kentucky case expressly hold that Congress has the power to adopt appropriate legislation, but has simply failed as yet to adopt it?

Mr. BAYARD. The Supreme Court of the United States in the case of The United States vs. Hiram Reese and Matthew Foushee, in considering the enforcement law of 1870, after treating of the limitations on the power of Congress, declare, (I read from page 3 of the opinion:)

> We are, therefore, directly called upon to decide whether a penal statute enacted by Congress with its limited powers, which provides in general language broad enough to cover wrongful acts without as well as within the constitutional jurisdiction, can be limited by judical construction so as to make it operate only on that which Congress may rightfully prohibit and punish. For this purpose we must take these sections of the statute as they are. We are not able to reject a part which is unconstitutional and retain the remainder, because it is not possible to separate that which is unconstitutional, if there be any such, from that which is not. The proposed effect is not to be attained by striking out or disregarding words that are in the section, but by inserting those that are not now there. Each of the sections must stand as a whole or fall altogether. The language is plain. There is no room for construction, unless it be as to the effect of the Constitution. The question, then, to be determined is, whether we can introduce words of limitation into a penal statute so as to make it specific, when, as expressed, it is general only.

They pass on to consider the danger of such an attempt by the court and say:

The courts enforce the legislative will when ascertained, if within the constitutional grant of power. Within its legitimate sphere, Congress is supreme and beyond the control of the courts, but if it steps outside of its constitutional limitations and attempts that which is beyond its reach, the courts are authorized to, and when called upon in due course of legal proceedings must, annul its encroachments upon the reserved power of the States and the people.

To limit this statute in the manner now asked for would be to make a new law, not to enforce an old one. This is no part of our duty.

We must, therefore, decide that Congress has not as yet provided by "appropriate legislation" for the punishment of the offense charged in the indictment, and that the circuit court properly sustained the demurrers and gave judgment for the defendants.

Without undertaking to say in this exceedingly cautious and carefully stated opinion of the court what would be their decision at another time or upon other statutes, I do state that considering these sections of the statute they have declared that there has been no appropriate legislation by Congress as yet. That shows that laws of this spirit and intent cannot successfully be passed again by Congress with the expectation of being sustained by the Supreme Court.

My honorable friend from Michigan has drawn my attention to a part of this opinion which I had marked myself for reference. I understood his question to be whether the Supreme Court had not recognized distinctly the power of Congress. In my opinion they have not distinctly recognized it, because the broad question is this: Those who construe the Constitution as I do would say the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were inhibitions upon the States and upon the United States from discriminating in the one case against the general rights of the citizen under the Constitution and in the other as to the right of voting between citizens on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude; that when those inhibitions had been transcended, then it was time for the courts of the United States to declare such law, either of the Federal Government or of a State, to have been violative of the Constitution and consequently null and void. But others contend there has been a grant of substantive power by the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to Congress; that, in the sections which give to Congress at the end of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments the right to enforce these amendments by appropriate legislation, this phrase contains a substantive grant of power to Congress. This view is urged, although the same language precisely is found all through the original Constitution, and Congress is given in the first Article power to carry into effect by "appropriate legislation" all grants of power, and the language of the grant at the end of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments is precisely the same as that found in the body of the original Constitution, which never was supposed to have the force of being of itself a separate and distinct grant of power, but was to be construed always in connection with the express grants with which it was allied. Therefore, unless these two amendments, irrespective of these words, contain grants of substantive power, in my opinion it is unjust, and it will be found logically destructive of our federal system of government if they shall be construed to contain such substantive grants of power as will be in effect repealing clauses not only of many of the most important features of the Constitution that precede them but of the very Constitution itself, because it cannot be denied, if the premises be admitted, that it gives to Congress a power which if followed to its natural conclusion would destroy the federal features of our Government and reduce the existence of the States to mere nonentities.

But, sir, I desire, as my attention has been called to it by the Senator from Michigan, to read the language of the court on that point:

The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one. It prevents the States or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, &c., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment there was no constitutional guarantee against this discrimination. Now there is. It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress.

What does that sentence mean when construed together? It states that the fifteenth amendment confers no right to vote, but it prevents the "States or the United States" from giving preference. How can a State give preference but by law? How can the United States give preference except by law? The protecting power of Congress has to be exerted in carrying out that right, whatever it may be. Now the measure as to what is "appropriate legislation" to protect is the very gist of this whole inquiry. Certain it is that the attempts to protect heretofore made by the Congresses of the United States, in the judgment of the Supreme Court were not "appropriate," and the laws under which these indictments were found not being appropriate legislation and within the limits of the Constitution, were absolutely void and the men charged under them were ordered to be set at liberty.

I do not say what may be argued hereafter or what, when a new statute shall be framed, will be found to be the definition of the power of Congress to protect this inhibition placed upon the States and the Government of the United States for the protection of the right to vote; but I do say that as far as existing law is concerned they have said that this is not the appropriate method of carrying it into effect. It seems to me that the reasons they have given will justly apply to the spirit and intent of this resolution. The court say:

That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by "appropriate legislation."

I submit to my honorable friend from Michigan that when he comes to reconsider his own resolution, he will find that the Supreme Court have in these opinions "as to the election of members of Congress or State officers and members of the legislature, and upon violence toward colored citizens of the State, and toward white persons disposed to aid those colored citizens at the election," expressly decided adversely to such a claim. The only question left for him upon which he can hang an argument in favor of any legislation of this character would be that which he has designated as the especial reason, to wit, that "the colored voters, on account of their race, or color, or previous condition of servitude, were deterred from voting, or were compelled to vote contrary to their wishes." There, and there alone, can there be any possible question, because as to what precedes in the resolution, the language of the Supreme Court is directly adverse.

Mr. President, I do not propose to take up the time of the Senate or fatigue myself by a criticism of these opinions. I merely wish to state their substantial effect upon present legislation and upon legislation of the character proposed now to be continued. I do hope that there will be no ingenious attempts made to escape from either the letter or the spirit of these decisions.

Sir, the experiment of congressional or executive interference with and of coercion upon the people of the States has been made very often, and never but with pernicious results. I do hope the Senate will respond to what I believe to be the sentiment of the country, and let us now try once more the policy of abstaining from interferences for this whenever carried out has been productive of nothing but what is desirable and useful. Take the case of the State of Virginia; take the case of the State of Texas. Interference was proposed; and fortunately was withheld. What was the result? Prosperity, peace, happiness, order, and good government. The people of this country to-day are benefited, greatly benefited by the presence in either Hall of Congress of men worthy of public trust. I am perfecty sure that every member of the Senate will agree with me when I say that the gentlemen who have come here under this régime which has been established in these States, unmolested and under their own laws, have met the esteem and confidence of the Senator from Indiana as they have of the entire country. On the contrary, if you wish to see the ill effects of interference, look at the State of Louisiana; witness there the condition of industrial and business pursuits—look at the temper of the people, look at all the ruin and trouble that have grown with every renewed interference either by the Executive or by Congress in the affairs of that State.

Mr. President, do not let us forget that this Government of ours was intended to be a government of law which all will obey, laws emanating from the will of the people, to which they lend voluntary support when once established; State laws for all domestic and internal affairs of a State; United States laws for all external purposes and the general purposes of the Union. The courts of the United States are open to all; all men are equal before the law; the same judges decide; they apply the same rule for the rich and the poor, the white and the black, in every State in this Union. The law of enlightend self-interest will compel peace and order in any community, for they are essential to prosperity and safety. Justice is essential; security before the law is essential; and industry and all that gives value to property, or protects either, will fly from a community where violence, outrage, injustice, and oppression prevail. Self-interest must of itself purge any community of its outlaws whose rule is destructive of all that good men value.

I trust, therefore, sir, that guided by the light of these last declarations of judicial opinion in respect of this character of legislation, guided by the light of experience in respect of the consequences of such legislation, Congress will abstain, and neither in this irregular nor in any other manner proceed further upon the doctrine that it is the duty of the United States to seek out and punish every infraction unasked of each man's individual rights, and for the assertion of which he has already wide and abundant avenues. The laws of the State give protection. The Constitution of the United States is the supreme law of this land, and all laws made in accordance. Surely in the State of Mississippi there can be no doubt that the whole machinery of the State government has been in the hands of the political party to which the honorable Senator from Indiana belongs and in behalf of whom this movement is made. Every official until this last election, and even to-day the members of her judiciary, were all appointed by an executive who was allied with the republican party. The judges of the courts of the United States we know were appointees of the present Administration; every district attorney, every marshal, every juryman, all are secure in their hands.

Mr. President, it is declared in this resolution that—

The people of all the United States have an interest and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose.

Sir, the people of the United States have an interest in the maintenance of law and the preservation of the Constitution; but I do not know that they are more interested in the enforcement of rights under the fifteenth amendment than they are in the rights guaranteed by the fourth and fifth amendments of the Constitution. Personal liberty, the right to be secure in your persons and papers against seizure without due process of law, the right of trial by jury, to be confronted by witnesses—all these are rights which have been violated over and over again in all these States, and violated by administrations of Government entirely in accordance with the views of the Senator from Indiana. Therefore, while I recognize the right, yet where is the necessity for legislation until it has been assailed, until it has been proved that the machinery of the States—who, as the Supreme Court of the United States say, are the proper guardians of these rights—has proved ineffectual? Hearken to their language, on page 4 of the opinion of The United States vs. Cruikshank and others:

> The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power. That duty was originally assumed by the States, and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right.

That is to say, where no law of a State denies the right, but the protection remains where it was found in the States:

> This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guarantee.

What was the guarantee? The guarantee was this: "The only obligation," says the court, "resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right," but that the duty was "assumed by the States, and it still remains there" to protect the right. Sir, under that rule what is there that makes it "especially" the interest of the people of the United States to pick out this portion of their population, the colored people, and to insist that their especial rights are to be followed up by this character of legislation, because, I will take the language of the resolution; it is that these five Senators are to inquire "how far these constitutional rights have in the said election been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation?"

We are told that the only guarantee of the United States that they are bound to carry out is the single one of seeing that a State does not deny it. There is no pretense that Mississippi has denied this right; none whatever. At times it is alleged that there has been intimidation by individuals which interfered with the free exercise of the right of suffrage. If it be so, the courts are open for redress in every case; and should a judge declare in a State court that the plaintiff had no right of action because of race or color, such a decision taken to the Supreme Court of the United States would be declared to be invalid, and the case remanded for proper judgment, and the right would be so enforced. If it should come that the State should by law attempt to discriminate, the law brought before the courts of the State or of the United States must necessarily and finally be declared to be invalid; and when the Government of the United States have done that, then their only guarantee has been fulfilled.

Then, Mr. President, to take this allegation that there is a special duty devolving on Congress because the people of all the United States have an interest in this fact, and to say that therefore there is a duty of legislation, would be to state but a truism. The question would be whether you are to undertake to legislate in respect of rights which are confided to the State for protection. The court say in reference to these rights:

> For their protection in its enjoyment, therefore, the people must look to the States. There is where the power for that purpose was originally placed, and it has never been surrendered to the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I have said all that I think necessary in regard to the dangerous effect of this proposed legislation and its line of adverse action to the spirit as well as the letter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. Even had this resolution been offered before those decisions, I should have thought it dangerous and harmful; but offered, as it now is, in the light of those decisions, I feel that there is not only a renewed duty on me to bring those decisions before the Senate, but to commend them earnestly and respectfully to those who may have before they were made thought differently as to the power of Congress on this subject.

Mr. President, I do not propose to reply to the elaborate indictment against the people of the Southern States of this Union which the honorable Senator from Indiana has filed here against them in a speech running through several days at the present session, and beginning with the resolution offered by him on this subject. It is true that Mississippi was the nominal point of his attack, but as it grew in bitterness it also grew in area, until it assailed the white population of all the States south of the Potomac. Nor were men of this day alone sought to be inculpated, but the faults, the follies, and the evil doings which the grave was supposed to have shut from men's memory, as well as their sight, have been exhumed, and revived, and held up to ridicule and denunciation by the honorable Senator from Indiana.

The sins of the fathers have been sought to be visited upon their children, not in the course of divine justice, but by a mortal as weak and faulty as those who are the objects of his denunciations. In his assault he has omitted nothing calculated to hold up these communities of his fellow-countrymen to obloquy and disgrace. Everything that could stain their repute, every charge that could tend to humiliate them before the country and the world or to exasperate their feelings, has been gathered with a cruel deliberation and unsparing diligence, and published by the Senate with the widest dissemination. What answer should be made to this and by whom should it be made? There are times when reckless assault and calumny are best met by a dignified silence on the part of the assailed. But in the present case I believe the best answer to the Senator from Indiana will come from the great and honest heart of the people of the great Western and Northern States and who are not the objects of his attack.

Will not every fair and just-minded man in the whole country say, when he reads this wholesale abuse and railing accusation of the Senator from Indiana: Why should this be? The Senate Chamber is the council chamber of the States of the Union; they meet here as equals for the common purpose of general legislation; to pass laws for the general welfare; to guard and advance the public credit, and strengthen the ties of Union between the States. And can such ends be subserved when the representative of one State shall, of his own motion, without any delegation of authority, without even a petition from a citizen, in the absence of any contest as to an election, rise here in his place and pour forth day after day volleys of charges not sustained by even ex parte affidavits of individuals, but the garbled and anonymous extracts from newspapers, all calculated to inflame popular opinion against an absent, unrepresented community, all tending to insult and mortify Senators compelled to attend these sessions, and to degrade and disgrace the States of this Union before the civilized world. What can be the effect, the only effect and result, of such a course? Can it be otherwise than disastrous to our own interests? Have not we seen already the leading officials of the late administration of Mississippi, in whose interests and behalf these charges were made and to stay whose fall they may possibly have been intended, pleading guilty of misdemeanor, as in the cases of Ames and Cordozo, by resigning in order to escape the consequences of imprisonment, or else awaiting a conviction under the almost unanimous verdict, without respect to party, as in the case of the bribe-taking lieutenant-governor?

Now, sir, it is well known that under those proceedings for impeachment it was perfectly proper and perfectly competent for the whole condition of the affairs of Mississippi and the late election to be opened up. There would be no difficulty upon that subject. The late governor of that State is a man of intelligence and force. He was educated at the expense of the people of this country as a soldier, and I believe was a brave and intelligent one. He had employed, and had the means to employ, able counsel. We know that he was so represented. Why should it be, then, that when the opportunity occurred in the proper form, in the very vicinage where these alleged wrongs were committed, that opportunity was not taken by him and by his political friends to hold up to the world the alleged terrible condition of that State and its internal affairs? Yet nothing of the kind was done. Why, Mr. President, there has not been to my knowledge an attempted contest for any seat in the other branch of Congress growing out of that election. There has not been an attempted contest of election in that State for any office in question. Why should it not be? We do know that there have been contests during the present session in the other House of Congress in which colored men have been awarded their seats, colored republicans, because it was held by a fair committee that they were entitled to them over their white democratic competitors. If this alleged fraud and intimidation had been so overpowering, why was not the attempt made by the usual methods and in the proper avenues of law to expose it, to hold it up before the people of this country? No party can gain strength by injustice; and if upon a fair showing any committee or any majority of either branch of Congress shall exclude a man fairly entitled from his seat, they will lose more by popular reprobation than they ever could gain from such injustice by exclusion. Sir, in regard to what does not appear and what does not exist the rule is the same, and where there was full opportunity for this discussion, where there was full opportunity for the most complete exposure of these alleged wrongs, why is it that it is left to the Senate of the United States, unasked, unpetitioned, and, as I consider, unauthorized, to enter into that State and hold an inquisition upon the domestic and internal affairs of that people?

Nay further, Mr. President, it is well known to the Senate and to the country that the late governor of Mississippi, Ames, who has just, according to the newspapers, resigned his place to avoid impeachment pending his trial, had correspondence with the President of the United States and the Attorney-General in respect of alleged disturbances in Mississippi during last autumn, that they made examination of the facts, and that neither the President nor the Attorney-General felt justified in granting him the military aid he asked to carry on the election in the presence of armed force. The President of the United States has sent to Congress sundry messages; during the present session his annual message at the opening of the session contained not one word of reference to this direful and terrible state of affairs which is alleged upon some unknown authority to have existed in the State of Mississippi. Could he as a just and honorable man have omitted to state when called upon by the Constitution to inform Congress of the state of the Union—could he in the face of such outrages have remained silent if such outrages existed? And who had better opportunities for knowing, or who would have been more likely to have announced them? Sir, it has been said that the Postmaster-General and the Attorney-General sent emissaries into the State of Mississippi during the last fall for the purpose of examining into the state of affairs, and that reports have been made by them, and that these reports do disclose nothing of the kind alleged in this resolution. I had it in mind at one time to introduce here a resolution to inquire of the Postmaster-General or Attorney-General if such written reports were not in their respective Departments. But would it not be a gross defalcation in duty if with this state of affairs existing in the fall of 1875, with the known relations of the then State administration toward the present Federal Administration, the facts should not have been known and should not have been brought before Congress? Surely, sir, if they did exist, it seems to me there must have been default upon the part of the Executive in failing to communicate them.

But, Mr. President, will not the calm judgment of the American people be that condemnation and not approval should await the Senator who uses his position here to utter such charges against the constituencies represented by other gentlemen upon this floor as must in the nature of things provoke angry retort, indignant denial, or possible recrimination? Sincerely I trust that none of these things will follow, but that the charges so made, unbacked by any due authority, will be suffered to fall unheeded by those against whom they were leveled. If this is to be a Union of States bound together by the ties of interest and affection, cemented by memories of a common ancestry and the hopes of a glorious and happy future, then such assaults must cease, and a sound public opinion must set upon them the seal of its reprobation. But as this present resolution is now before us, I propose to apply the test of the opinions of the Senator from Indiana himself, as deliberately stated by him on a former occasion in writing, and submitted as his report to this body. I read from page 73 the views of Mr. MORTON in the Louisiana investigation:

> The theory of our system is that every State government possesses the power and machinery to correct the wrongs and frauds within itself practiced under color of or in open violation of its own laws, and that the decision of its own tribunals, created by its constitution and laws for such purpose, must be received as final. When the constitution of a State provides that each house of its Legislature shall be the judge of its election and qualification of its members, full faith and credit must be given to their action; and should the Government of the United States go behind their action to inquire whether the members have been lawfully elected to the Legislature, their independence would be wholly destroyed and the validity of their action made to depend upon the will of Congress. So, when the laws of a State have constitutionally created a returning board to ascertain who are elected State officers and members of the Legislature, if Congress may go behind the decision of that board and inquire whether they had the returns before them, and whether they were acting in accordance with the laws of the State, the election of State officers and members of the Legislature would be placed absolutely under the control of Congress.
> The Constitution says that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years." The manner of constituting the Legislature is left absolutely to each State, and the question of its organization must be left to be decided by such tribunals or regulations as are provided by the constitution and laws of the State; and the only question about which the Senate may inquire, in determining the admission of Senators, is whether they have been chosen by the Legislature of the State—that Legislature recognized by the State, or whose organization has been accepted by other departments of the State government. Under our complex system of government all questions of the organization of State governments, under their own laws, must be left to the decision of the tribunals in such States, created for that purpose; and when such decisions have been made, they must be accepted by the Government of the United States in their dealings with such States. It is no answer to this to say that, in a particular case, such tribunals will or have decided wrongfully. The Government of the United States has no right to review their decisions so long as the State possesses a government republican in its form.
> The doctrine that all questions of election, arising exclusively under the constitution and laws of a State, must be left to the settlement and determination of the proper tribunals created by the State for the adjustment of such matters, was distinctly recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States in the celebrated case of Luther vs. Borden, growing out of the attempt in the State of Rhode Island to overturn the old charter government and establish a new one in its stead. In that case the Supreme Court said: "The point then raised here has been already decided by the courts of Rhode Island. The question relates altogether to the constitution and laws of the State; and the well-settled rule in this court is that the courts of the United States adopt and follow the decisions of the State courts in questions which concern merely the constitution and laws of a State."

On page 75 he states:

> This whole affair, on both sides, is unfortunate and painful, and if Congress could, without exercising a dangerous power and establishing a perilous precedent, set aside the election and provide for a new one, with security that it should be fair, it would be far more satisfactory to the people of the whole nation. Murder is the highest crime; but it is not every court that has jurisdiction to punish it, and one court cannot assume such jurisdiction upon the ground that another to which it has been granted will not properly exercise it; and Congress has not the jurisdiction to examine and redress every great wrong that may take place in a State. Where by the constitution and laws of a State legal remedies are provided for the redress of all wrongs that may take place in regard to elections, it would be inconsistent with the independence and integrity of the State governments for the United States to interfere and assume jurisdiction upon the ground that the State tribunals have acted wrongfully and fraudulently, or will so act. The Government of the United States is not a Don Quixote, going forth to hunt up and redress all the wrongs that may be inflicted upon the people in any part of the country; but is a Government limited and restrained in its jurisdiction by the charter of its creation, and that charter distinctly recognizes the existence of State governments to be constituted legally by the States themselves, subject only to the provision of the higher law that they shall be republican in form. This doctrine in nowise recognizes the blood-stained theory of State sovereignty, which has been the evil spirit in our political system, and to which the present troubles in Louisiana may be traced back, but springs from the great fact that the States have a vast body of rights distinctly guaranteed and recognized by the Constitution of the United States, and that among these is the right to constitute their own Legislatures, and determine by their own tribunals the legality of their organization.

Mr. President, how in the face of the declaration of such doctrine as this the honorable Senator can find it within his power to institute such an inquisition for the purpose of examining into the election of members of Congress and of State officers and of members of the State Legislature, and as he himself proposes to do this for the purpose of obtaining testimony in respect of the election of the Senator who was to be chosen by that Legislature, is more than I can see. He may possibly recognize it, but I do not think the Senate can recognize the consistency of his two positions. Perhaps that is of less importance, because the consistency of an individual is a matter more personal to himself perhaps than important to the country; and yet it ought to affect the people of this country before whom the able and ingenious arguments of the Senator go, colored and heightened by such addresses as this which I find headed in the most startling manner, for the purpose of throwing obloquy upon his political opponents and bringing utter discredit upon the community where these things are alleged to have taken place. If he could give utterance to such opinions in regard to Louisiana in 1873, I merely ask him to apply the same doctrines to Mississippi in 1876. If he does so, then he will be compelled to oppose his own resolution.

But, Mr. President, I plead to-day for peace and for union among our States and all the people of all the States. Standing as now we do upon the threshold of the second century of our existence as a republican people, rejoicing in all the happiness we have secured under our experiment of popular self-government, let us gather from our sorrows and mistakes new and wise counsel, and resolve to avoid in the future the rocks upon which we have so nearly split in the past. Our task is not an easy one, but one which calls for all our care and all our self-control, all our wisdom and mutual forbearance. We floated for many years upon a smooth sea of unbroken prosperity with a superabundant revenue, which only forty years ago had actually created a surplus in the Treasury which was divided among the States—a nation without a farthing of public debt. Such was our condition in 1836. What a blessed and marvelous exception! Sir, we can say this no longer. With a vast increase of population no longer homogeneous as at first, but composed of men of nationalities differing as widely as men can differ in their habits, capacities, and dispositions; with soil, climate, and production within our national jurisdiction of every conceivable variety, the necessity of local self-government is made more and more apparent as our development in industries continues.

From a fearful struggle, a civil war of awful magnitude and appalling consequences, our people have just emerged, still possessed, thank God, of a common country and a common Government. One result of the war is a public debt greater in proportion to the accumulated property of the people than any of modern times, and this debt made heavier, less manageable, more distressing in its burdens by a confused and false system of currency and finance. Financial errors and mismanagement have led our people into the morasses of a false and fictitious prosperity. We have followed false lights and have been allured by that will-o'-the-wisp, paper money, into great difficulties in which the industries of our people are now floundering and which threaten wholly to ingulf our prosperity for the present generation unless wise measures are adopted. For our common relief we need the common aid—the aid of the hand and the heart of every patriotic American. We can afford to lose none. Every man must be encouraged to bring his tribute of duty, love, and patriotic service to the altar of his country.

It is no time for denunciation of one State or section of the country by another. The man who does it is a foe to public credit, as dangerous or more so than if leading an armed assault upon our shores. The political party that assents or permits it to be done is not safe to be intrusted with the control of public interests. The assault upon the fair fame and good name of any State or number of States is an assault upon the credit of all, and will cause trust and confidence to be withheld from all. This resolution, if adopted, will be made the basis for such an assault, and can have no other effect. It is indeed "a perilous precedent," as it was styled by the Senator from Indiana; like the horse of Troy it bears armed foes within its body. Political power ebbs and flows like the sea. To-day it is with you, to-morrow it may be against you.

The affairs of New Hampshire and her mode of conducting elections may, under the rule of this resolution, be investigated by some future Senate committee. The elections in New York may be ruled by corrupt canal rings or the will of her people thwarted by an enormous and overgrown army of custom-house officials. Will any one here be willing to make such allegations the pretext and basis of investigation for the purpose of meeting such wrongs by Federal legislation?

Sir, we cannot embark upon such a system. We must leave such matters to be dealt with by the uprising of an honest public sentiment in the States where the wrongs occur and whose laws must protect the people in their rights. The polls are open. Let each man there freely express his views. He can do it, and if misgovernment exists in a community having the power of self-government uninterfered with by external force, then the fault is easily to be brought to its proper home and can be cured by natural and proper means. Sir, I cannot believe the sober second thought of the American people will permit the ambitions of any man or any political party to stand in the way of the prosperity and happiness of our people, and that any measures tending to reproduce the excitements and pernicious effects from which the people of the Southern States have suffered so dreadfully since the war closed in the spring of 1865, and which have so reacted upon the prosperity of the whole country, will ever receive public sanction in any portion of the country.

Never did a phrase awake a louder echo in human hearts than that which bore the present Executive into power: "Let us have peace." I will not pause to consider how he has used that power so confided to him, but I will repeat from my heart the words he then used: "Let us have peace; let us have an end of executive and congressional interference with the elections in the States and the local affairs of the people of the States; and then, and then only, will we have that peace which is essential to heal the wounds of war and bind our fellow-countrymen in a real, a permanent union of interest, of feeling, and patriotic devotion."

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, it has been the rule of my life whenever I have given offense to any one, to defend or explain what I have said or apologize for it. The Senator from Delaware was pleased to say, under some excitement I think, in response to a suggestion from me, (which meant only this: that I thought he would find it difficult to sustain the statement he had made,) that I had succeeded in injecting into his speech a bit of political tirade such as he had often before listened to. I do not stop to consider the delicacy of that language, its appropriateness to the Senate, the quality of urbanity which it takes from the character of the Senator who pronounced that phrase, but I think the difficulty was in this: that I disturbed the harmony of his speech, and therefore disturbed him. I do not know but that this is a school in which manners are to be taught, and that the Senator from Delaware is self-constituted or otherwise authorized to teach good manners to his associates; but while he stands here peculiarly, in his own estimation, a non-partisan, having, as he has told us this morning, the judicial fairness of the bench to pass upon political questions which agitate the country, it might be well for him to illustrate his theories by an example now and then of the way in which those theories can be put in practice and commended to other people. I am neither a scholar here nor a teacher. I submit myself to argument, to reasoning, to justice; but I do not submit myself to the authority, to the dictation, to the schooling of the Senator from Delaware, or any one else. If the Senator desires to teach, let him find his pupils elsewhere, especially in teaching manners. There is an old English article upon truth and integrity, which commences, as I remember it, in this way: "Truth and integrity have all the advantages of appearance, and many more."

This great truth applies to individuals. It applies here. It is applicable to-day; it is applicable to the country; and in what I purpose to say I speak of it only in its application to the country. For seventy years the spirit of hypocrisy and misrepresentation dominated over the slave-holding section of this confederacy. They continually presented themselves to the country and to the world as the friends of the Union, and it was a lie from first to last. They were the enemies of the Union; and when the Union did not answer the chief purpose which they had, and the only purpose they had, the preservation of the institution of slavery, they made war upon the Union. The Senator from Delaware was the political supporter and ally and the substantial defender of the men who made war upon the Union, who clung to the Union for seventy years under the falsehood that they were its friends. They were its enemies all the while. Slavery, the spirit of slavery, is and ever has been the enemy of the Union, and it is so to-day. The troubles in the South are due to the spirit of slavery, and the time has come when I am forced to confess to myself and with reluctance to say here that I do not in my heart believe that any man educated under and obedient to the influence of slavery can be the friend of a Union that is designed to establish and preserve equality. The North will do well to take heed and to trust no man who was brought up under the influence of slavery, controlled by its spirit, and dominated by its power, and is not yet extinct.

Is it not something that after having defended and preserved the Union, the republican party gave political rights to the men who had made war on it for four years, who crimsoned the face of the whole country with blood? Was it not something? Those very men to-day, fresh from fields of treason and of blood, are engaged in investigating the conduct of the war by which they were prostrated. The Senator from Delaware, under the sanction of the opinion of the Supreme Court rendered on Monday last, looks to the time when the Ku-Klux, some of whom were fined and others of whom are imprisoned, are to have their fines returned from the Treasury of the United States and the doors of the prisons opened that he and his friends may welcome them. They are imprisoned because they did the behests of slavery; because they obeyed the policy of the ancient democratic party: because they submitted to the spirit that always controlled that party, that controls it to-day.

Does the Senator from Delaware expect an uprising of the people of the North to defend his friends in the South? Let him beware of November. The people of this country are already awake to the truth that the spirit of the rebellion which they supposed had been subdued by war is still powerful in the South; that it oppresses four million human beings; that it instigates outrage and wrong; that there is no freedom in those States for people who are not identified with the old slaveholding aristocracy of that section of the country. No, sir; if the people of this country fail to do their duty the Government is lost. If they fail to overthrow the democratic party by a vote so overwhelming that there can be no excuse for bribery, for falsehood, for double returns, this country a year from this will be involved in another civil war. Nothing but an overwhelming vote of the people, from which there can be no appeal by traitors, will save us from civil war. We are nearly in the same condition that we were in 1860 and 1861—eleven States without the power of free elections; and you call this a free Government, and appeal to us for union, for concession, for friendship, for justice! The democratic party to-day has the power it had during the war. If at any time during the war the democratic party of the North had said, "This war must cease; we will give no aid or comfort to the democracy of the South in their attack against this Government," the war would have ended. If you who co-operate with the democracy of the South will say to them, "Do justice to the negro people there; give them their rights, civil, social, and political," all occasion to appeal to the North for justice, for sympathy, for co-operation, for support, will pass away. There is no feeling in the North but a desire that you should be just to the people of the South, to the black man. We can take care of ourselves. We will co-operate with you when you do justice to those who sympathize with us; but, so long as you trample under your feet 4,000,000 people entitled to rights under this Government equivalent to your own, can you expect us to forget these outrages upon our fellow-men and take you by the hand and say, "We are brethren, citizens of a common country; let the past be past, and by-gones be forgotten?" Injustice cannot be forgotten. The democratic party of the North is to-day responsible for the outrages perpetrated upon the black men of the South, and they have been responsible from first to last. Their appeals to me are vain. When they do justice then there will be harmony; but until they do justice there can be no peace. "Let us have peace," said the President. Why did we not have peace? Because the political associates of the Senator from Delaware dominated over the southern country, defied the laws, oppressed, persecuted, and murdered citizens; and now they appeal for peace.

Mr. BAYARD. In a portion of the remarks submitted to the Senate this morning I made a statement in respect of the cost in money to the people of this country as a result of the enforcement acts, the constitutionality of which has been so questioned by late decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I stated at the time that I had not the figures before me, but I believed that millions upon millions had been spent.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator said "tens of millions."

Mr. BAYARD. I believe I did, but I stated distinctly that I had not the figures before me, and said that I believed that to be the case. I was interrupted by the Senator from Massachusetts with a question in regard to my authority for this statement, I having previously stated that I made this remark upon an estimate and without having the figures before me. Under the pretext of the question, the Senator proceeded in a very rabid, in a very angry, and, as I consider, a very improper manner to avail himself of my having yielded to him the floor as a matter of courtesy to ask me a question, to make what I called a political tirade; and I think upon examination it will be found that my description was exceedingly accurate. I am not at all disposed to withdraw the designation which I then gave to his language. Since that time he has indulged in another. He has cleared his heart of a good deal of that black bile that seemed to rest upon it toward the people of the southern country, and toward those of us here, or me in particular, whom he considers their associates. I leave him, as I left the Senator from Indiana, to be answered by the honest heart of the people of the North, who do not hate the southern people as he does, who do not long for their humiliation, and crow and laugh over their distress as he does, who do not stand here in this council chamber of the States to insult and affront every man by declarations of impeachment of his honesty and integrity when he professes to love the Union and the Government of his country. I leave him to be answered by his own people. There has been, thank Heaven, a spirit of reconciliation abroad; it was exhibited not many weeks ago in the city of Boston, as described to me, in a way that drew tears both from men of the North and men of the South when they met in the presence of the common glory of their country and resolved that the past with all its animosities should be forgotten and should be forgiven. But he raises the cry of hate. He still is to pour out vials of indignation and wrath upon every man who has differed with him in opinion.

The Senator has suggested that in some way I have been a party to some act or deed unfaithful to the integrity of the Government of this country. I will simply say that every drop of blood in my body comes from men and from women who, since this Government was established, never harbored a thought or did an act unfaithful or unpatriotic. No man can assert the contrary. The Senator dare not do so. He might attempt it by an innuendo, by classifying me with those whom he terms the enemies of the country; but he knows as well as I that the man who says I ever did an act or uttered a word unfaithful to the integrity of my country's Government has lied in his throat. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.] He bids me beware of November. In November the people of this country will submit their candidates for the popular verdict, and then the Senator may repeat his speech where he pleases. Then he may assault men as he pleases. If it shall please a merciful Heaven to give to this country a feeling of fraternity and union, then he and those who think and act with him will be consigned to private life and to an absence from political power. We will go before the people of this country. I expect to go with all the rest as a private citizen, and to submit the doctrines of the party with which I act, to submit the measures that we propose for the government of this country to the intelligence, to the candor, to the patriotic sense of the people of this country. If the verdict shall be against us, it will still be our country, and we shall obey the men whom you have elected just as fully as if we had elected our own candidates. Minorities have no terror for me; none at all. I have not flinched from declaring on any occasion an opinion that might have seemed unpopular at the time.

Is it to be held up to me as a source of reproach that I have tried to make my brethren of the South feel that this was their country, that this was their Government, and that they were bound to come and support it, and find protection as they gave it allegiance? If it be a crime, then am I the greatest sinner on earth. If such feelings, such professions, and such principles shall consign me forever to a minority, then welcome the shades of private life with the unstained conscience that I shall carry there with it. I would rather have it than all your power, than all the power the people of this country can give, for I have something they did not give and which they cannot deprive me of, and that is my own self-respect. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will take this occasion to say to the occupants of the galleries that it is a breach of the order of the Senate to applaud, and he now tells the Sergeant-at-Arms to place sufficient force in the galleries to remove every person and all persons who thus create a breach of the order of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I did not catch all that the Senator from Massachusetts said. In regard to my political associations, that is a matter in which opinions may lead us sadly astray, in which a man is neither the worse nor the better for the opinions which he honestly holds. One evil of our times has seemed to me in condemning or praising men for the accident of their opinion. Their personal character, the degree of respect to which they are entitled, certainly does not depend upon the result of their mental organism or the objects which may affect their opinions. I remember very well that when I first came into this Chamber I was one of a minority of about eight men. Then, as now, I was on what is believed to be the weaker side, a side which the calmer judgment and growing generosity of this country toward the South is gradually making a stronger side, a side which I trust for the safety of the whole country will in November next be destined to be the strongest side; but whether it is or no the issue is not with us, and it is for each man to do that which he thinks is right in bringing it about.

I have esteemed men most highly who differed with me entirely in opinion. I remember well, upon my first coming into this body, that I said to a gentleman exceedingly violent in his proscriptive feelings toward the southern people, but for whose personal character I had the highest respect, "How strange it seems to me to hear you speak and vote as often as you do in the Senate, when if your home had been but a few hundred miles south of where it was you probably would have been just as violent on the other side, just as positive a rebel, as you call it, as you were a Union man." That gentleman was the late Mr. Jacob M. Howard; and I remember perfectly well his entire assent, saying he really believed in his heart it was so. Is it possible that at this stage of the world's history men are to be condemned, vilified, abused, because of their honest political or other opinions? It seems to me very narrow-minded and a miserable condition of affairs if such things should be. I do not believe that such a course is at all in consonance with the temper or the wish of the American people, who, like all great people, are a generous people. They do forgive, except where they believe that meanness, hypocrisy, untruth, and dishonor have stained the character of a man. When that is so, they are justified in withholding from him their confidence. I am glad in speaking now of the coming month of November that there is some question of personal character to enter into the contest; that the people of this country will insist that a man shall not be the mere figure-head of party, with its name stamped upon his forehead; but they will look below the badge, and they will see whether the man who bears it is a consistent man, speaking his conscientious sentiments in victory or defeat, standing by his principles whether they are to lead him into minorities or into majorities. These are to me the tests; and therefore, so far from having to beware of the month of November, from my heart I welcome it. The day cannot come too soon when the people of the country shall decide on which side is the right or wrong, the true love of country, the true patriotism, in this country. I believe there is an instinct of self-preservation that will show the people of this country whom to trust and whom not to trust. I believe in that, and therefore it is that I approach that contest without fear.

Something was said by the Senator about my looking to a time when the Ku-Klux shall return, and he said something about my being politically associated with such a class of people. I hardly know how to answer such suggestions. If there be any act of mine, if my name has ever been connected with an act of lawlessness or of dishonor, the Senator has my free permission to point it out or to obtain it from anywhere in the world if he thinks he may; and then he may have justification for his charges or his innuendoes. I do not propose to make this Chamber the theater for assertion or for denunciation. I have no epithet whatever to throw back upon him or his State or his party. He must stand or fall by his own works. I leave him and his speech of to-day to be answered by the people of the great, ancient, and honorable Commonwealth of Massachusetts. They must speak to him because he here assumes to have spoken for them. If he has spoken for them, I was going to say so much the worse, in my opinion, for them; but I do not believe that he has. I do not believe he has spoken the sentiments of Massachusetts in uttering words of bitterness and hate toward the southern people and a distrust of those who are here as their representatives.

But in this strain I have already continued too long. I had no idea there would be in this matter a personal remark or personal feeling. The Senate is no place for it. I think I can refer to my record here in debate to show that I am not wrong in saying that when I have spoken of the action of Senators it has been in regard to their official action, their opinions, and the record of their printed views. Wherever I have thought that they tended injuriously to the public interests I have not hesitated to say so, and I propose to continue this course so long as I remain a member of this body.

Certain it is that the question of urbanity, the question of attempting to educate the Senator from Massachusetts in anything like a rule of courtesy, is something that I should entirely despair of. I do not propose to attempt the task. I did not suggest it. I merely commented upon what I thought was a breach of decorum in the Senate when in asking a question he injected a political tirade into my remarks.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I had not intended to say anything more upon this resolution. It is true I had material evidence collected in regard to the truth of the charges that have been made as to the Mississippi election, but I became satisfied that the Senate was sufficiently well informed upon that subject. I concluded to postpone the production of that testimony.

The Senator from Delaware to-day has made this rather a personal issue. I have generally declined issues of that kind on this floor. I am not sure but what I could stand a hand, however, in a personal controversy, but I should regret to try it. The Senator had the record of my speech in his hand. He had the proofs that I offered of the truth of what I said, nearly all collected from democratic sources. The evidence was overwhelming. He said he would not undertake to answer, and he did not for the simple reason that he cannot. The evidence is conclusive; but the Senator directed his speech to myself. He said that I had calumniated the people of the South; that I had garbled newspaper extracts. He has a copy of that garbling in his hands, and I should be glad for him to undertake to show in a single instance where I have made a misrepresentation. But the Senator was exceedingly unfortunate in one thing. He undertook to show that I was inconsistent. He read an extract from my report in the Louisiana case to show that I denied the power of the Senate to go back and inquire whether the members of a legislature had been elected, to inquire whether the tribunals of the State, which had passed upon the qualification of members of the Legislature, could be impeached, and that we were bound to take the Legislature as the State gave it to us. I stand upon that doctrine to-day. I have not in any speech on the Mississippi resolution said one word in conflict with that position; and the Senator cannot point it out.

I am consistent; but the Senator unfortunately is not, and he stands up here to-day in contradiction of the ground that he occupied all through the Louisiana controversy. It is within the memory of the members of this body that he argued we had a right to inquire whether the members of the legislature who elected Pinchback had themselves been elected, denied the legality of the State tribunals to pass upon that election, and by his vote finally insisted and stood upon that doctrine. Day after day he has advocated that doctrine here; but to-day he comes in and denies that doctrine, and insists that we cannot inquire into the election in Mississippi. It was perfectly competent to inquire into it in Louisiana in the Pinchback case, but it is not competent to inquire into it in Mississippi in the Lamar case. As the lawyer said to the farmer, "circumstances alter cases." The doctrine in regard to Louisiana, which the Senator so ably, so eloquently, and so often advocated, he expressly repudiates here to-day. Therefore I say I have an immense advantage over the Senator. I am consistent and he is not. He seemed to think consistency was an important thing. I rather like it myself; but he is a most melancholy evidence that men may be inconsistent and apparently not know it. It is said that the ostrich, when pursued by the hunters in the desert, will stick his head into the sand and be under the impression that his whole body is concealed.

The Senator said in the conclusion of his first speech, "Let us have peace." I echo that sentiment. Let us have peace. When the murder business stops, when intimidation and outrage in the Southern States stop, then we shall have peace; but not until then. When a majority of 30,000 in Mississippi can be overcome by murder, by violence and fraud, and a democratic majority of 50,000 put in its place, so long as those things are done, we cannot have peace. When a majority in Louisiana of 20,000 can be overcome by fraud and violence and bloodshed we cannot have peace. When a majority in Alabama of ten to fifteen thousand can be overcome in the same way it is idle for those persons who sympathize with them or defend them to talk about peace. "Peace when there is no peace." When this violence shall cease, and when men of all parties and of all colors in the South have equal rights, then there will be peace. It is a short and an easy road. It seems the crime is not in committing murder. The crime is, not in the intimidation and oppression of millions of people, but the crime is in talking about it here, making a fuss about it and disturbing the former serenity of the Senate and of the country. The Senator has not one word to say about all this scene of bloodshed and violence in the South, but his whole complaint is that we talk about it here and create feeling in the country.

The Senator started out in his speech by saying that the committee which it is proposed to raise by this resolution should be a joint committee of the two Houses; that it is not competent for one House to raise a committee and make an examination of this kind. The Senator was doubtless oblivious to the fact that the other end of this Capitol has about twenty or twenty-five committees making investigations the ostensible pretense of which is that they are to get knowledge so as to enable them to legislate, whereas we understand the real purpose is to make political capital. In the face of twenty-five or thirty investigating committees in the other end of the Capitol, created only by one House and expending thousands of dollars every day in investigations, the Senator argues here that we can only investigate by joint committees of the two Houses! It is competent for a democratic House to investigate, but it is not competent for a republican Senate to investigate. That is the strength of this argument.

Then the Senator said that he had been shocked by the expenditure of money in prosecutions and by the hunting up of cases under the enforcement act, and he said that the money thus expended amounted to tens of millions of dollars. Tens of millions of dollars means $20,000,000 anyhow, and carries the impression of a great many more millions. I sent for the appropriation act. I find here the appropriation for 1875:

For defraying the expenses of the Supreme Court and circuit and district courts of the United States, including the District of Columbia; and also for jurors and witnesses and expenses of suits in which the United States are concerned, of prosecutions for offenses committed against the United States; for the safe-keeping of prisoners, and for the expenses which may be incurred in the enforcement of the act of February 28, 1871, relative to the right of citizens to vote, or any acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, $1,000,000.

That has been on the statute-book now five years. That was the fourth appropriation after the passage of the law. The appropriations have been, I believe, $3,000,000 every year. There have been $12,000,000 appropriated altogether for all the courts north and south, prosecutions of every kind, east and west, and yet we are told that tens of millions have been expended in prosecutions under this unconstitutional law! I think it is incumbent somewhat upon the Senator to re-examine his figures and to correct that statement before it goes out to the country. I suggest that.

The Senator spoke about the law as being unconstitutional law and the outrages committed under it. He said he hoped the time would come when Congress would repay to the men the fines they had been compelled to pay under that act. In other words, the Ku-Klux are to be indemnified. The Senator boldly states the proposition that he hopes the time will come (and it will come, too, when the democratic party get control of Congress) that the fines shall be repaid to the men who have been punished as Ku-Klux under that act. That is to be an issue, then, in the approaching November. Refund, re-imburse, indemnify these scoundrels who have been punished under the Ku-Klux act.

The Senator in speaking of Mississippi said that Ames pleaded guilty, and he proceeded to denounce him. I do not know that Ames has pleaded guilty. From what I know of the condition of things in Mississippi, from the articles of impeachment against him, which I read carefully, and from all that I know about the whole case, I have no doubt that that prosecution was without foundation; that it was simply to get power to drive him out of office. When Ames resigned yesterday he knew that his impeachment was a foregone conclusion. They had seized the Legislature by fraud, by murder, and intimidation. They were determined to have the executive. He knew it and resigned. Then what did they do? They withdrew their charges. It was not the punishment of crime they were after, but it was simply the office, and when he resigned they condoned the pretended crimes. If Ames had been guilty of a felony then your democratic Legislature compounded that felony; and the charge comes back——

Mr. BAYARD. Will the Senator allow me to state that in speaking of Mr. Ames—for I desire to do him or any other man justice—I said distinctly that he had been indicted for misdemeanor, and that, to escape the consequences of impeachment, he had resigned. In speaking of him I said that he was an officer of the Army, a man of intelligence and courage. That is, I believe, the only remark I made. I spoke of nothing for which he had been indicted. Certainly I have not the least belief that there was a stain of personal dishonesty upon Mr. Ames; but I said that he had been guilty of misdemeanors, for which he was impeachable, and for which he would have been impeached if he had not resigned.

Mr. MORTON. My memory is not a very good one, I am aware, but if it is not very much at fault, I think the Senator said in his first speech that Ames had plead guilty and confessed to his crimes.

Mr. BAYARD. I cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator now exonerates him from any moral wrong. I believe the country will exonerate him from moral wrong. We have the confession here in the Senate of the United States to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. LOGAN. In the telegram, which is the only information we have, it is stated that the articles of impeachment were withdrawn prior to the resignation. According to the democratic theory it makes no difference whether the resignation is accepted or not, he would still be impeachable. I ask the Senator if the impeachment did not stop in view of the resignation of Governor Ames?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator's confession here just now, that Ames did nothing morally wrong, but still that he was guilty of technical misdemeanor, carries with it the confession of the whole crime in Mississippi. There was the crime against the State in the election, the crime against the Legislature, and then there was the crime against the governor; and after all it has been confessed on this floor by a democratic Senator. He was driven out of power by a Legislature that were determined to seize upon his office. It was to them a political necessity. He yielded before the storm. It may have been wise or it may not have been wise. It is hard for us to judge on that subject without we could put ourselves in his place.

The Senator represented me as having assailed all the white population of the South. I have never done so. I assailed the murderers of the South; those who trampled upon the rights of white and black republicans; and I do it again. Not only that, but I assail their defenders. To the loyal people of the South, the peaceable and the law-abiding people, I extend fellowship and fraternity; and I say here what every man from the North knows is true, that in the North there is no animosity toward the South; there is no feeling of hatred toward the people of the South. If republicans in the South, white and black, could enjoy the same rights that democrats enjoy everywhere in the North there would be a return of fraternity, of fellowship, of national love. It is the existence of these wrongs that keeps alive this bitterness of feeling, but it does not extend to the whole South; it extends to the perpetrators and to their aiders and abettors, be they North or South.

The Senator has referred to the decision of the Supreme Court on Monday. I shall be frank enough to say that I regard those decisions as unfortunate, but it is not my business or duty here to criticise them or endeavor to explain them. The Senator read an extract from the case of Cruikshank, I believe from Louisiana, which I should be glad to have.

Mr. BAYARD. I will hand it to the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. I cannot refer to the passage, but he quoted to this effect: That the fourteenth amendment in its first section went no further than to deny to a State, acting affirmatively, a right to deny equal protection of the laws or the right to withhold the enjoyment of the rights and privileges of a citizen of the United States; that the Constitution went no further than prohibiting a State by her legislation—the Senator used the word "legislation"—from denying the right of a colored man to vote or denying the equal protection of the laws; and that, unless the State did that, the Congress of the United States could not interfere. I do not know whether the Supreme Court said that, but if they did, so far as I am concerned I repudiate it utterly. I have some knowledge of the circumstances under which those amendments were adopted. I read the debates which occurred. I was present when one of them passed this body and took some little part in it, and I profess to understand what was the spirit of Congress at that time and the understanding of the country. What is it for a State to deny the equal protection of the laws? When a State by her legislation expressly withholds from part of her people the equal protection of the laws, that is one thing; but when a State government utterly fails to protect a large class of her people, that is denying to them the equal protection of the laws. It is the duty of the State to protect every class of her population; and when a State fails to do it, I do not care whether that failure is intentional on the part of the officers or the result of the weakness or imbecility of the State government, it is denying the equal protection of the laws, and Congress can come in and furnish that protection.

This was the understanding with which both those amendments were passed. I know it, and we all know it. It was to place the enforcement of each amendment in the power of Congress; and it was then the understanding—and I can tell the Supreme Court, humble as I am, if they do not know it—that if the State by its government failed to protect a part of her people, or if she were unable to do it, if anarchy prevailed, that failure on the part of the State was a denial. The failure of the State is denial by the State. That was the understanding which we had of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments.

Mr. BAYARD. The Supreme Court of the United States does not recognize your understanding.

Mr. MORTON. The Supreme Court of the United States use some general phrases. I do not know exactly what they mean; I shall not stop to consider; but what I am speaking of now is what was understood, and this whole country knows it; and if the Supreme Court does not know it, it is the only body of men in this country that do not. When we came to the fifteenth amendment, that no State shall deny to any citizen on account of his race, his color, or his previous condition of servitude the right to vote, and provided that Congress might by law enforce it, what did we mean by it? We meant to look to just what has occurred in Kentucky and Mississippi and other States, that if by violation of the law they should deny colored men the right to vote, trample on their right, and the State authorities were powerless or unwilling to enforce that right, that condition of weakness or that unwillingness must be considered a denial on the part of the State. Why? Because it is the duty of the State to enforce the right; and if the State fails to do so from any cause, the State denies the right. That is the construction we gave to that amendment when it passed this body; and there are Senators all around me who know it, who were present on that memorable night when the amendment passed. The recorded debates show it; and if it is now to be narrowed down and confined simply to a case where a State passes a law denying the right of suffrage to colored men, it is frittering the amendment away.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to make a suggestion there?

Mr. MORTON. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If that were the whole effect of it, would it not render the power given to Congress to pass appropriate legislation simply nonsensical? Would it not be simply a judicial question for the Federal courts to decide?

Mr. MORTON. The Senator states the point very clearly; and I remember that very point was discussed on this floor on the night of the passage of the fifteenth amendment. If it is confined to a case where a State by law denies a colored man the right to vote, Congress has nothing to do with it, because that act is in violation of the Constitution of the United States, and every State and United States court would be bound to hold it so, and it is not important for Congress to legislate on the subject. It is not the business of Congress to say that a State law is unconstitutional; Congress has never done that; that is for the courts; but when Congress had the power given to it to enforce that amendment, it was intended to enable Congress to punish the men who deprived colored men of the right of suffrage.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Will my friend permit me a word?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. There is one part of these constitutional amendments which I do not think the Supreme Court has ever attempted to weaken, and which seems to me to be the very foundation of liberty and order in this country. I will read it:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. * * * The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

When you make a man a citizen of the United States, you do something more than give him a pleasant name; you do something more than put a badge upon him. You invest him with the rights of citizenship—freedom, the protection of the law, the right to suffrage when conferred by law. The people of this nation have declared, and no Supreme Court has yet questioned it, that Congress has the right to enforce that citizenship by appropriate legislation. The argument which is made, that this is opening the field of all criminal jurisprudence to Congress, has nothing in it. You can readily distinguish between infraction and infringement of a right which is an infringement of the rights of a citizen and of those natural rights which the State protects. I simply wished to call the attention of my friend in this connection to that important view of these amendments.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from New Jersey; I think his position is impregnable; and I venture to say that when once it comes to be the established doctrine that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments only prohibit the States by legislation from depriving the colored people of the right of suffrage or the equal protection of the laws—whenever that comes to be the doctrine, then the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments will be destroyed, and what we have done will be lost. I repel that construction for myself, now, here, and forever.

My friend from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] suggests that the decision of the Supreme Court does not cover that ground at all; they do not put themselves upon that ground. I hope he is right. He has read those decisions more carefully than I have; but, if he is right, the Senator from Delaware is necessarily wrong.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator from New Jersey, did I understand him to say that he considered that the fourteenth amendment gave the right of suffrage as a right to a citizen?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, sir. I trust my friend did not understand me so. If it had done that, it certainly would have been unnecessary to pass the fifteenth amendment in order to confer that right.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator consider that the fifteenth amendment conferred the right of suffrage?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I consider that the fifteenth amendment prohibits any citizen of the United States from being deprived of suffrage on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Mr. BAYARD. That I might have learned without the Senator being put to the trouble of a reply; but I misunderstood him possibly at first when he read with such emphasis the first paragraph of the fourteenth amendment, that all persons naturalized in the United States or born in a State should be citizens of the United States and citizens of the State where they reside; and I understood him to say that that gave them something more than a mere name; gave them rights and gave them the right to vote. I may have misunderstood him.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It gave them a right to be protected by Congress in the exercise of all the rights of citizenship, and by a subsequent enactment suffrage was made to be one of the rights of citizenship, so far as race, color, or previous condition of servitude was concerned.

Mr. BAYARD. I have the impression that the Supreme Court have in the most distinct manner decided, not only in these two last cases, but long before, that neither the fourteenth nor the fifteenth amendment bestowed any right of suffrage upon anybody; that it is a right given by the State, controlled by the State, wholly within the power of the State, with one single prohibition, and that is that the States shall not discriminate in bestowing it as to race, color, or previous condition of servitude; that is all.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The question as to whether these citizens have the right to suffrage is not before us. We all know that they have the right of suffrage in every one of the States, no matter how they got it. Having the right of suffrage, that is one of the rights of citizenship, and we are authorized by the fourteenth amendment to enact all laws to protect that citizenship in all its rights; and suffrage is, no matter how they got it, an admitted right of these citizens.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator think the United States court can enforce my right to vote in a State if it is objected to, I otherwise being qualified under the laws of that State?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose that if in the State of Delaware they should attempt to disfranchise the Senator from Delaware, Congress would have power under the fourteenth amendment to protect that right which he as a citizen possesses in Delaware.

Mr. KERNAN. Will the Senator from New Jersey allow me to put a question? As I understand the Senator from New Jersey, he insists that by the fourteenth amendment men who are made citizens cannot, by the States, be deprived of the right of suffrage. Am I right?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I did not say so. I said that under the fourteenth amendment, where a citizen has the right of suffrage, Congress can protect him in it.

Mr. KERNAN. If the States give it cannot the States take it away? I put this case because there are States in this Union where men, right within the fourteenth amendment, who are citizens are not allowed to vote.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is an entirely hypothetical case. In those States of which we are speaking they have not attempted to take away the right of suffrage. These citizens have the right. It is one of their rights as citizens. The fourteenth amendment says we may protect those rights of citizens.

Mr. KERNAN. The only question I wanted to know——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is a theoretical question.

Mr. KERNAN. No, a practical question. I ask whether, if a State of this Union says that a certain class of white citizens shall not vote, they can get redress under the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. If a State in this Union says that persons shall be deprived of the right of suffrage because they are white——

Mr. KERNAN. Being white men; not for that reason.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That is a hypothetical question again. If you ask me if the State declares they shall not vote because they are white or because they are black, I answer that certainly we, by legislation, can protect those rights; and the Supreme Court has expressly so decided.

Mr. KERNAN. I do not put it on color; I put it on citizenship. Does the Senator say that white citizens who are deprived by a State of the right to vote can get redress under the fourteenth amendment? That is the question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I suppose that all States in this Union, unless they have been admitted into the Union, as I believe some of the States have been, on certain constitutional guarantees, can change the qualification of voters as they please.

Mr. KERNAN. Then they can take it away from white citizens of the State under the fourteenth amendment?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But while the citizen possesses it—and that is the case before us—Congress has the right to protect that right of the citizen.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I have occupied the floor longer than I intended to do. I think there need be no obscurity on this question. The point is a vital one, and cannot be asserted too strongly here, that where a State fails by its weakness, or willfully, or ignorantly, to protect colored men in the right of suffrage, the Government of the United States has the power to do it, and it is its duty to do it; and wherever a State fails willfully, weakly, or ignorantly to give to all the equal protection of the laws, and where the equal protection of the laws is denied to one class of men, the Government of the United States has the power to enforce the enjoyment of that right, and it is the duty of the Government to do it. That is what Congress meant when it passed those two amendments. That is what the debates show; and whenever those amendments are narrowed down to the mere point of these things being denied by legislation on the part of a State, the amendments are virtually destroyed, and the concluding part of each one is made nonsense where it is said that Congress shall enforce it by appropriate legislation.

Mr. President, in regard to this resolution of investigation, I find just here an argument that is unanswerable, if there were no other, in regard to the right and the power of the Senate. In the Kentucky case just decided there was an indictment containing four counts, under sections 3 and 4 of the act of May 31, 1870:

Against two of the inspectors of a municipal election in the State of Kentucky, for refusing to receive and count at such election the vote of William Garner, a citizen of the United States of African descent.

And the Supreme Court say in conclusion:

We must, therefore, decide that Congress has not as as yet provided by "appropriate legislation" for the punishment of the offense charged in the indictment, and that the circuit court properly sustained the demurrers and gave judgment for the defendants.

We have a right to investigate what wongs have been inflicted, to see what legislation may be required. We have a right on every ground to have the whole country understand what are the enormous wrongs that have been inflicted in the State of Mississippi; for, if under our form of government a majority of 30,000 people can be suppressed by violence and a fraudulent majority of 50,000 or the other side put in its place, Legislatures captured, governors driven out of office—if all this can be done by violence and there is no remedy anywhere, I say that our Constitution is a failure; I say that any State may become a despotism under the Constitution of the United States. The highest duty of any government is to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of their rights as citizens of the United States. If we cannot do that, then our Constitution is a failure. Let me state that again. The highest duty of this Government, or of any government, is to protect its citizens in the enjoyment of their rights as citizens; and when the Government fails to do that, it is recreant; and if it has not the power, then the Government itself is a failure.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, it is a little difficult for a Senator occupying my position on this floor to know exactly by what line of argument to meet some of the allegations and to repel some of the taunts and worse than taunts which have been thrown out against those who come from my section of the Union and couched in language which I certainly never expected to hear uttered in this Chamber. I cannot consent, under any conceivable circumstances, to repel those insults and those insinuations in similar language. But, sir, I desire that the Senate will consider that everything that a Senator and a gentleman legitimately may say is said in repulsion and repudiation of the charges that have been made against me and my section.

If it be the purpose, as is more than suspected, of gentlemen who have occupied the floor here to-day by these insulting charges against southern Senators to provoke them to such imprudent utterances as may be made available in coming political contests to enable them to array again one section of this country against the other and to give some coloring to the allegation made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] that the civil war is not ended, and that all the hatred and strife which have been engendered thereby are still in full force and operation, influencing every man at the North as well as at the South—if such be the purpose, I do not propose to contribute anything to the success of that maneuver. I have said what I propose to say upon that subject.

Mr. President, I am happy to here state my high appreciation of the courtesy, the kindliness of feeling, and the manifest sincerity which actuated the mover of the substitute now under consideration, in the remarks which he has offered and the resolution which he tendered. I freely admit that he has come up to what I regard as the full measure of statesmanship in discussing this resolution; and while I thus return him my thanks, individually and for my section, for the courteous terms in which his remarks were couched and for that spirit of fraternity and liberality which prompted him to "put himself in our places," as he forcibly stated it, and to judge us from that standpoint, I propose to correct what I fear are some misapprehensions on his part of the actual feeling and temper of the southern people. I certainly claim to be able to speak authoritatively for my own State, for my own people, for my own section.

I assert upon this floor to-day, with all the knowledge of the obligations which such an assertion involves, and also with a full consciousness that I may bring myself under the imputations which have been made to-day in reference to Senators making declarations of a somewhat similar character, that the people of the Southern States, certainly of my State, have accepted the issues of the war in good faith, that they have recognized and do to-day recognize the equality of all men under the law. I assert to-day that from the moment that war came to a close, indeed long antecedent to that period, the fate of slavery was known to be doomed in Virginia, and no one anticipated, whether the struggle should result in success or disaster, that slave property, as such, would remain valuable in Virginia. But when disaster crowned the efforts which we had made, and we were forced to accept such terms as were offered us by the victorious armies of General Grant, not a voice was raised, so far as I know, not an effort, organized or otherwise, was made to resist emancipation and its necessary consequences.

I will say more than that, sir, that the people of Virginia recognized, as a general rule, to which I will admit there were exceptions, the necessity which imposed upon them the education of their former slaves, the necessity of bringing them up to a point where they could intelligently exercise those rights of citizenship with which they had been invested by the legislation of Congress. True it is that we were not prepared for the precipitancy with which these rights were bestowed upon these people, and were startled and alarmed at their probable, not to say inevitable, consequences.

I am conscious that our people are misunderstood in some regards; they are to-day misunderstood with regard to their feelings toward their late slaves. I assert, that after the conclusion of the war and the emancipation of the slaves, so far from being influenced by hate and animosity and a vindictive desire to crush those people out of existence, or drive them from the country, precisely the opposite sentiments were felt by a very large portion of the people of Virginia. I assert that the southern people have never to this day forgotten, and never will they forget, the obligations they are under to their black population. I hope that my right hand may be withered and my tongue palsied if I ever fail to acknowledge my own personal obligations to them. During the war, when the whole manhood of the South was carried to the front to fight the battles of the South, our wives and our little ones were left alone under the charge and the guardianship of our slaves; and I am proud to say to-day, that notwithstanding all the inflammatory appeals and all the nefarious influences which were brought to bear upon that population to induce them to bring the war to a speedy and bloody end, they were deaf to these appeals, they resisted these influences, they were true to the trust reposed in them; and I hope I shall never see the day when I am afraid or ashamed to acknowledge our obligation to them.

This being the case, those of us who looked at the situation divesting ourselves of all prejudice, if any existed, had to decide what was the best thing that we could do in the then prostrate condition of all our industries and all our interests. The question of the relations between labor and capital at once sprang into existence full armed like Minerva from the head of Jove, demanding immediate recognition and adjustment, and we had to settle upon some policy to meet the difficulty. The disposition was felt by our people generally to give the preference to this black labor to which we had been accustomed, if we could prevail upon them to discharge the duties of laborers with anything like fidelity. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] has dwelt very largely in his speeches here upon the existence of a "white line," of a race issue in the South, which I am not prepared to deny to a very considerable extent did exist and may, to some extent, still be found. I wish to submit one or two statements to the Senate of the United States, and through them to the country, to show that it was not the white race who are responsible for the raising of that issue or the drawing of that line. If the Senate will pardon me for detaining them a few moments with matters of detail, I think I can bring them to agree with me in this conclusion.

What was the first step toward the segregation of the one race as against the other? It was the organization of loyal leagues, under the operation of the Freedmen's Bureau, throughout the Southern States, where the whole black population were enrolled in the list of membership. Every appliance was resorted to; the whole country was swept around to entice them in, and place them not only under an obligation but under a sworn obligation to support the republican party; and we had the spectacle presented through all the Southern States of colored people who would appeal to their late masters for advice, for assistance, for aid upon any and every subject other than political, but who had arrayed themselves in one solid phalanx against the white race upon every political question or every question involving an election.

It may be a fact not known to some of the gentlemen who hear me, that the first constitution which was framed for Virginia under the reconstruction acts was framed by a convention composed in a large degree of our former slaves and of gentlemen who hailed from any and every nationality other than Virginia, and that among the provisions of that constitution were some which, if carried into effect, every man who hears me here to-day will admit would have brought utter and irretrievable ruin to every interest of the State. It provided that the test oath should be applied, not only to all persons who proposed to hold office, but to every person who proposed to vote and to every person permitted to serve as a juror throughout the State of Virginia.

I want to recall to Senators the recollection of this fact, that the test oath was originally designed for application to northern and not to the southern communities. It was enacted in 1862 during the hottest period of the war, when it was not expected that any southern man would apply for office under the United States Government, its object was to exclude from a share in the offices of this Government such persons as sympathized with or had aided the rebellion in the Southern States. That was the design of the test oath. But you will see that when that oath came to be applied to southern communities, it was far more widespread, far more sweeping, far more ruinous in its operation than it could possibly be in any northern community. Why? Because the whole South—I say it literally—the whole South had gone into this war and there was no person there—I say no person, of course there may have been individual exceptions, but there were few persons in any community who could come forward and swear that they had furnished no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement to the rebellion or to any person engaged in armed hostility to the United States. The consequence was that every office which was to be filled in Virginia would have been of necessity filled by an alien or a negro without education and without that information which would enable him to discharge the duties of the office properly; that every man who came forward to vote in an election must have belonged to the same class; that every man who proposed to sit as a juror to adjudicate any question involving life, liberty, or property must be drawn from the same class.

Now you see at once, I do not care what political party you may belong to, you are bound to see at once, the utter ruin which would have been wrought if such a constitution as that had been inflicted upon us; and when, after a canvass of the State of Virginia, which pointed out the effects and the ruinous consequences of such a constitution as this, public sentiment began to concentrate and crystallize against the constitution proposed, and when the period which was fixed for its being submitted to a vote of the people was postponed by military authority because it was obvious that it would be rejected, when opportunity was offered to make an appeal to General Grant, and through him to the Congress of the United States, to permit three distinct clauses of this constitution, which were most objectionable, to be submitted to a separate vote of the people, giving them the privilege to sustain the residue if they thought proper and to reject these—when all these things were done, and the election was held on that constitution, what did the results indicate? We find that 102,000 white men, almost without a solitary exception, voted in favor of adopting a constitution which gave to our negroes the right of suffrage and the right of holding office, and every right enjoyed by white men, while 88,000 men, almost exclusively colored men, voted to retain those disabling features in the constitution and thus deprive the white men of the privilege of holding office, or of voting, or of taking any part in the administration of the laws.

Is it remarkable that in such a condition of things the white people of the South generally—because this was not confined to Virginia; I speak of Virginia because I speak of what I know—is it a wonderful circumstance that under such a condition of things as this, the manifest necessity of a union of the white people to preserve the political power in their hands became a matter of self-preservation? If this fact is to be construed as is indicated by the discussion here to-day, and whenever this question is debated, I ask Senators on that side of the Chamber "to put themselves in our place," and ask if they can find it in their hearts to hold this up to public reprobation as a measure of outrage and oppression and wrong?

I do not like, Mr. President, now, and I do not propose to give expression to my feelings, plans, and purposes toward this Government and the preservation of this Union. Warned by the signal station which has been put up on the other side, I do not propose to place myself in the category of those who are denounced here as men who cannot under any circumstances be trusted and whose professions of fealty to the Union are hypocritical and false as hell itself. But I would ask the Senator who has introduced an illustration drawn from my own profession, because it is a little in the line of my own personal experiences, to revert to this analogy. The Senator from Indiana spoke of the impolicy of attempting to heal our wounds superficially and declared that it was no good surgery which would advocate such a procedure. I would ask him to contrast that surgery, if he pleases, with the surgery which proposes to tear open a freshly cicatrized wound, and just as often as the bands of union are shooting forward from one side to the other, cementing together in a solid and useful and healthy union that which had been a gaping and bleeding wound—if he proposes, whenever these bands are formed, to destroy them by tearing them asunder, and instead of applying emollients and soothing applications to pour in vitriol and corrosive sublimate, how long would the patient last under such treatment as that?

Mr. MORTON. Allow me to ask a question, or rather it is in the form of an answer, that the tearing open of these wounds is not done by proposing to investigate wrongs in order to prevent a repetition of those wrongs nor by denouncing crimes that have been committed. The tearing open of these wounds consists in the outrages committed in Mississippi and other States such as have been denounced. If those outrages had not been committed there would be no occasion to talk about them now.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is assuming what the report of this proposed committee will be when it shall have been raised, and shall have investigated, and shall have reported. The fact has not yet been demonstrated that the outrages described exist. I am not personally cognizant, of course, of anything in the matter; but those who profess to have more cognizance of the condition of the affairs there than the Senator from Indiana can possibly have, deny their existence; and so we have assertion against assertion. That is all of it. The weight of authority in fact, as my friend from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] suggests, is on the other side, because investigations have been made into the condition of affairs in Mississippi by the Government's accredited official organs, by the order of its official head, and their report, so far as we have any reason to believe, furnishes no support whatever to the allegations which have been made. The President certainly refused to interfere in the manner requested. But are we to take mere random declarations of newspaper correspondents, or even the insane utterings of such men as Robert Toombs, or the half-crazy declarations of a violent partisan editor of a political paper as incontrovertible evidence of the existence of a condition of things spreading through a whole State, and a fair exponent of public sentiment? Why, sir, it has not been three days since I saw assertions made as to the mode in which elections are carried in other States, notably in one of our northern sister States, where it was distinctly asseverated that bribery was resorted to, where the sum paid to the voter was specified, the amount sent to certain named towns was given, and the sum per capita cited which was expended in securing votes. Would we be justified, therefore, in coming forward here and asking for a committee to investigate the manner in which that election in New Hampshire was held, and the abuses which were perpetrated there, because bribery is just as much inhibited by the Constitution as intimidation or fraud? Manifestly not; manifestly it would be improper.

But the objection I have to this resolution is that in my opinion it tends to destroy local self-government, and arrogates to Congress a power which I do not think properly belongs to it, as is fairly deducible from the Constitution which controls us all.

If—I predicate it with an "if"—if abuses exist such as are alleged, if intimidation and fraud have been practiced to the extent that is reported, I have no doubt that the State governments are competent to, and will furnish a proper remedy. I know I can truly speak when I say that if they can be proved to have occurred in Virginia, the remedy can and will be applied, as I know in a case which has recently occurred there, when in the progress of a contested election investigation it was demonstrated that ballot-stuffing had been practiced and that frauds had been perpetrated, steps were taken to correct those evils for the future and to provide against their recurrence.

As to what the effect of the decisions of the Supreme Court in the cases which have been alluded to so frequently to-day may be upon the settlement of this question, I am not prepared to say; but I call attention to the declaration of the distinguished Senator from Indiana that if the Supreme Court of the United States has indicated that any of this legislation was unconstitutional, "he repudiated the decision of the Supreme Court." Sir, what would have been said had any of us of the South——

Mr. MORTON. I can assure my friend that I did not make that statement.

Mr. WITHERS. I beg pardon if I misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. MORTON. What I said was that if the Supreme Court gave the construction to the constitutional amendment claimed for it, I for one repudiate it and always should. I was referring to the construction given to the amendment by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not see that that very much alters the force of the position I took. My idea was that the Supreme Court being recognized by the Constitution as the supreme authority to adjudicate the constitutionality of any law, the decision of that tribunal was final, and for one I have been taught always to acquiesce in it; and although it may be made contrary to my preconceived idea of what was Constitution and what was law, the fiat having gone forth from that tribunal, I have always felt that I was bound to succumb and to yield obedience thereto. Any repudiation of its decision is simply revolutionary.

And that reminds me of another very remarkable declaration which was made by the Senator from Massachusetts, which struck me as exceedingly startling and suggestive, and I could not help thinking what would have been the condition of affairs here and through the country if I, or any of the gentlemen who surround me on this side of the Chamber, had given utterance to such a sentiment. The Senator from Massachusetts, as I have written down his words, made a declaration to this effect: that he warned us to beware of the coming November, and he asserted that if the republicans are not sustained by the popular voice in such overwhelming numbers as to render opposition futile we might look for another civil war. What is to be understood by his proposition? That if the democratic party triumph in the coming election in November another civil war is imminent! I would ask, who proposes to resist this fiat of the people in case it should be given in favor of the democratic party in the coming election? Certainly not the democratic party; certainly not their friends or their allies. Therefore the proposition to resist must come from the other party. If I have made such a declaration here or if the Senators around me had uttered such a sentiment, I have no doubt the hands of the gentleman would have gone up in holy horror, and he would have waved the bloody shirt with three times as much empressement as he has done this morning, and called on all his clans to rally to the rescue to crush out these unrepentant rebels of the South!

Sir, if the declaration of the Senator from Massachusetts meant anything, it meant the declaration of a deliberate purpose to resist the inauguration of a democratic President or the installation into authority of a democratic Senate or democratic government if the voice of the people should so decide in November next.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the Senator allow me——

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly; I do not design or desire to misrepresent in any way, or misconstrue even, the declarations of any Senator.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I meant to state simply, and I think I did state—the RECORD will show, however, about that—certainly what I meant to say was that unless the election was overwhelmingly in favor of the republican party, considering what had been done in Mississippi and Louisiana in violation of law for the suppression of public sentiment, in some way that election would be defeated; if it were a mere meager majority that there would be an effort to deprive the republicans of the government. Far be it from me to make the suggestion that, if the democrats are successful in the election, there will be anybody to resist. Nobody will resist if it is a fair election.

Mr. WITHERS. I endeavored to take down correctly the words of the Senator as they were uttered, and my version does not correspond with his statement. The RECORD, however, will show, provided it be not revised, and I will abide by it.

The legal points involved in the resolution which has been offered for our consideration have been so thoroughly reviewed by a much more efficient and skilled hand that I do not propose to travel over any of the ground which he has occupied, although I had designed doing so. I am glad to know that they have received the consideration of one fully competent to grapple with them; and while I am not unmindful of the fact that the legal gentlemen upon this floor place different constructions upon some portions of the opinions recently rendered by the Supreme Court, I think I am right in assuming that so far as those decisions go they indicate the futility of all the legislation upon which the Senator from Indiana so much prides himself in the direction of carrying out these constitutional amendments. And if I grant the power to Congress, which I do not, to enact additional legislation to carry out more fully the provisions of the Constitution and to meet the constitutional difficulties suggested by the decisions of the Supreme Court, I do not see why it should be necessary to send any committee to investigate alleged facts in Mississippi to furnish the ground for such legislation on the part of Congress. I think the decision of the Supreme Court furnishes ample ground. And if the Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator, desires to consummate and perfect such legislation as will enable them to carry out the provisions of the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, the decision of the Supreme Court furnishes all the ground they need upon which to predicate the legislation they desire to enact for this purpose, for it is very clearly seen that notwithstanding what has been said by the distinguished Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] neither the fourteenth nor the fifteenth amendment confers any right of suffrage upon black or white. The only effect of those amendments is to prohibit the States from drawing any distinction in their laws prescribing the right of suffrage on account of the color, or race, or previous condition of servitude of the parties. This is clearly shown in the fourteenth amendment, because it distinctly admits the power of a State to qualify the right of suffrage and make that right a condition-precedent upon certain qualifications coupling the right of suffrage with certain conditions, whether educational or property qualification or anything else. The only thing the fifteenth amendment does, as I construe it, is to provide that in case such legislation be enacted by a State it shall apply indiscriminately to black and white. If this difficulty by which the Senators on the other side find themselves confronted needs correction, and is capable of correction by additional legislation, to carry out these constitutional provisions, I do not see why they cannot at once introduce a bill for the purpose and provide the necessary legislation to enable them to compass their ends.

Mr. President, I have discussed a few points which have been raised in this debate simply from a sense of duty to myself and to the section which I represent. I have done it in a crude and discursive manner, but I think I have said sufficient to show my own appreciation of the different tempers, dispositions, and spirits in which the gentlemen who have occupied the other side of the Chamber have approached the discussion of this question. I hope I shall never cease to appreciate and to acknowledge courtesy and kindliness on the one hand, nor to rebuke, so far as I properly may, discourtesy and insult on the other. I know one thing, however, that I feel in my inmost soul that the present condition of this country, its financial depression, its ruined business, its silent manufactories, its deserted mines, can never be remedied by declaring to the world in the highest legislative assembly of the nation that nearly one-half the country is influenced by nothing but bitter hate and hostility to the Government, and seeks only a favorable opportunity to plunge it again into ruin and blood. I think I am safe in saying that, and the Senator from Massachusetts himself may well pause and reflect whether a continuance of this kind of discussion and the constant agitation of these sectional issues and these constant charges and criminations may not have more to do with bringing on the ruined condition of our finances and the prostration of our business than anything else. Certainly it seems to me that capitalists in foreign countries seeking investment had much rather bring their money here, where it affords a fair prospect of legitimate profit in the face of a homogeneous and united people, moving forward with due obedience to law for the common purpose of benefiting a common country, than they would invest it in a country where one-half of it was arrayed in deadly hostility to the other, only awaiting a favorable opportunity to carry into practice the sentiments which they are alleged to entertain in secret.

I leave the question with that suggestion for the consideration of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I ask the Senator from Texas if he will yield to a motion that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next, unless there is some objection to that?

Mr. SHERMAN. I object, if an objection will prevent it. I think we had better go on with the public business.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will not insist on it.

Mr. MAXEY. I had not intended, Mr. President, to utter one word on the resolution as originally offered by the Senator from Indiana or the substitute offered by the Senator from Michigan, but as I happen to be one of those Senators at whom the blow of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] was aimed, I deem it due to myself and the State I have the honor in part to represent to say something in reference to the remarks which he made. I desire here to state that as I have never uttered a word since I have been a Senator calculated to estrange the people of the North and the South, so I never will so long as I have the honor to be a Senator on this floor. When I heard the noble sentiments uttered by the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] so honorable to his head and heart, I believed them to be a true expression of the sentiment of the people of the North. In that speech he placed himself upon the plane of elevated and true statesmanship. He is a true statesman who, when a great civil war has cursed a land, endeavors to pour oil on the troubled waters and to heal the wounds of that war. That is true statesmanship, and when those sentiments were uttered every chord in my heart vibrated with joy that a man from the North, a republican, whose personal character and whose political reputation stand so high as those of the Senator from Michigan, differing from me in politics, should have the manliness and the independence to utter the sentiments which he uttered here. I believe the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Michigan truly represent those of the northern people. I do not believe that the sentiments uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts represent those of any respectable portion of the people anywhere. Sir, malignance and hate may gain for a man local celebrity; he may accomplish a purpose in a given section of the country by uttering sentiments of hate, by arraying one portion of the Union against the other; but be that man from the North or from the South who endeavors to gain celebrity at the expense of this broad Union, he is not a statesman. Such men are political Pharisees, thanking God daily that they are better than other men, and belong to the class of whom Christ said, "But all their works they do to be seen of men." With their name He coupled a synonym, (hypocrite,) and the two will go "sounding down the ages," linked together in infamy, "to the last syllable of recorded time." "Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel." "Ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayer."

Why, sir, not only did he arraign the Senators who have the honor to hold seats on this floor, but, going back in the history of the South for seventy years, he arraigned the statesmen of the South, the people of the South, as being enemies to the Union. "Upon what meat doth this our Cæsar feed, that he is grown so great?" Mr. President, does the Senator not know that within that seventy years James Madison, a southern man, conducted the war of 1812 to a successful termination? Does he not know that Andrew Jackson, another southern man, gained us great glory at the battle of New Orleans and as President of the United States? Does he not know that the administration of James Monroe was marked for its ability, and that the Monroe doctrine which he announced has been as important to our well-being as any doctrine which has been asserted for the last fifty years? Does he not know that Zachary Taylor and Winfield Scott, both southern men, conducted to a successful termination the Mexican war, which gave us the magnificent territory brought into the Union by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo? Does he not know that a southern President, James K. Polk, at that time presided over the destinies of this Union? Does he not know that Henry Clay's clarion voice rose up in 1850 in behalf of the Union, and that he more than any other one man was potent in saving the Union? It was the voice of the Henry of Navarre of the glorious old whig party, a man whose eloquence has never yet been surpassed in or out of this Senate Chamber. And yet the Senator, not satisfied to stop at the war which has just closed, goes back for seventy years and arraigns the whole people of the South as enemies of the Union. Sir, he defies history, he defies the truth of history, for the purpose—no, I will not say for the purpose—but with the effect of arraying one section of this Union against the other. Sir, when we heard but a short time ago in the State of Massachusetts, in the presence of assembled thousands of the Senator's own State, the glorious words of General Bartlett there uttered, I thought that he represented the true sentiment of that noble State of Massachusetts, and I think so yet; and the sentiments uttered by the Senator to-day do not represent them, in my humble judgment, because I believe that there is nowhere any true man or set of men who want to keep up the strife which has so long separated the sections of the Union. Every true patriot, be he republican or democrat, from the North, South, East, or West, knows that a restoration of fraternal feeling is necessary to a real union, and that confidence in each other, confidence in our free Republic, confidence in the perpetuity of free institutions under our matchless Constitution are essential to the prosperity of each and every part of our incomparable Union. The true man will work to these ends.

The late warwas a war of giants, such as no people but Americans could ever have fought; and it has been my honor and my pleasure to have met since its close the distinguished generals on both sides who engaged in that war, and we have met as brothers. There is not lingering in the hearts of the brave soldiers of the Union a solitary bitter feeling against the people of the South. We fought it boldly; we fought it bravely. I remember a description by Victor Hugo of the great battle of Waterloo, where the forces of Napoleon were arrayed against those of Wellington; and it was a glorious battle, fought as only brave men can fight. In that battle the undaunted, unconquerable imperial guard went down forever. I remember that he goes on, in his thrilling, graphic description, better than painting, to describe the man Thénardier, "less a man than a ghoul," who went on that battle-field after the battle was over, after bravery had done its duty, rifling the pockets of the dead and of the dying, "with hideous furtive hand which glides into the pocket of victory." I perform no such role. I aspire to no such distinction. I stand up in the American Senate as one who was engaged in this late war, and plead for Union. I repudiate the heresy which would sow the apples of discord among the American people for personal aggrandizement and local celebrity. Such men are not statesmen; are not true lovers of the Union as it is. They fail to comprehend the great truth that this Union rests, not upon power, not upon the bayonet, not upon the Army and Navy, but upon the strong enduring affection of the great American people. If they could appreciate this sentiment, which they do not, "Charity toward all—malice toward none," they would be better men.

It is said that we are all against the colored people of the South. Why, sir, it was no longer ago than at the last Fourth-of-July celebration that I, democrat as I am and a former slave-holder, and a descendant of a slave-holding ancestry, was invited by the colored people of my county to address them, and I did address more than fifteen hundred of them to the best of my ability; and at the close of that address they presented me in token of their kindness and regard for me for so doing a beautiful bouquet of flowers. I appreciated that as one of the highest honors ever conferred on me. Sir, the colored people of the South have no truer friends on this earth than their former owners, and they know it. Whenever they get into trouble it is to them they go, and they get good advice, cheerfully and freely given; and often, very often, the old family servants have the helping hand extended to them by their former owners. While each knows his social position, there is a tie between them beginning in childhood neither wants to sever.

That is the feeling between the men of the South, black and white. Why should I dislike the colored man? Why should I have feeling against the colored man? I was born and reared among them; and during the four years of war when the whole South was stripped of her fighting population, when few were left at home but the old men, the women, and the children, the colored people were there, and a more true and faithful people never lived on this earth. I glory in the privilege of standing up here in the Senate Chamber and saying that we had no insurrection; the women, and the children, and the decrepit of our country were cared for by the colored people, and felt and were perfectly safe; and to this good day when those people want advice they go to the men they know best; they go to the men with whom they were born and reared. Such is the feeling of those people there.

Now as a matter of common sense let us look at this question. Whatever the Senator from Massachusetts may think of the patriotism of the people of the South, (and he seems not to put a very high estimate on it,) yet it would not do for even that Senator to say that they have not common sense. When it is borne in mind that the only laboring population of the South that can be employed for farm-work is the colored laborer, because the white man soon gets land of his own, when it is known that the white man is the land-holder and the colored man is the labor-holder, and when each is necessary to the other, I ask you if common sense would not teach that white man to treat the black in such a way as to secure his friendship and respect? I can speak for my own State; I know that better than any other. I do know that of the first crop raised after the close of the war we shipped only about 79,000 bales of cotton, and I do know that last year we shipped half a million bales. Could that labor have been employed if the colored man had been treated as it is attempted here to induce people to believe he was treated? No, sir; the white man and the black man in my State I know get along on terms of mutual kindness, and I believe this true of the great mass of people all over the South. That we have bad men there I do not deny, and you of the North have bad men; but will any honest man hold a whole community responsible for a few turbulent, disreputable characters?

But I got up, Mr. President, only to say that when the Senator from Massachusetts sees proper to charge Senators on this floor from the South with coming into the Senate Chamber traitors and rebels at heart, or words substantially meaning that, I repel such a charge as unwarranted and untrue. The Senators from the South who are on this floor are men of as pure character, of as honorable purpose, as the Senator from Massachusetts or anybody else. When I took the oath of office, I meant precisely what I said, and I give my testimony that the people of the South, the very people that he has so maligned and so traduced, want union. They recognize the great fact that so long as the sections of the Union are severed, so long as they are kept apart, so long as they are estranged, the Union cannot prosper.

Mr. President, it does no good, it is not statesmanship, it is not that spirit which actuated Thrasybulus when Athens had been engaged in a death-dealing internecine war; when brother had been arrayed against brother, father against son; the whole of Athens prostrated by the result of a civil war. At its close "confiscation" was cried out by some, banishment by others; but true statesmanship was shown by him. He said: "So far from confiscating the property of the conquered, or banishing them, we will make them citizens." That was over two thousand years ago, and history shows that the splendid statesmanship exhibited by Thrasybulus was crowned by the success of Athens as it never had been before.

Go anywhere in history and broad statesmanship teaches that at the close of an internecine war there shall be oil poured on the troubled waters. England had her time of trouble during the wars of the Roses, which, if I remember correctly, lasted about thirty years. Blood flowed as York or Lancaster got possession of the throne. Common sense at last prevailed. All that was obliterated and buried with the past, and Englishmen can now speak of those battles that occurred during the war of the Roses as the battles of Englishmen, without caring whether those who engaged in them were on the side of York or on the side of Lancaster; and the time will come when the people of the North and of the South, united together again in the bonds of common brotherhood which I hope can never be sundered, will look with pride upon the achievements of both North and South, because they are the achievements of Americans. No men but Americans could have fought such a war, and that great fact will be recognized. If we are true to ourselves, if we are true to the great States which sent us here, we shall do everything in our power to break down all the asperities which may separate the States, do everything in our power to heal up the wounds of the past, and once more have a cemented Union that nothing can sever.

Mr. President, why the Senator from Massachusetts saw proper to take the course he did, I know not; but I do know that such speeches as that will do no good anywhere. They will do no good either North or South; but, as I said in regard to his speech, so I repeat, that I have no more respect for a southern man who will scatter discord, breed dissension for the sake of local celebrity, than I have for a northern man. He who would seek self-aggrandizement at the expense of his country is not a true patriot. He may call me rebel; he may call me traitor, and all that; but that is not love of country which keeps a country apart, and bare assertion of superior patriotism, of superior love of country on the part of the Senator over that of southern Senators, when no justifying word has fallen from the lips of any of them, is simply Phariseeism on his part, for which I do not hold the people of the North in the slightest degree responsible, for I do not believe they will indorse any such unwarranted, unprovoked attack any more than I do, and I ask the people of the South to charge the assault to the Senator alone and to no on else.

Mr. President, I have now said more than I intended when I rose, and I only got up, not to touch the questions at issue, because I think they have been sufficiently discussed, but simply to reply to what I thought an unwarranted and uncalled for, and I may be pardoned if I add unjust and unjustifiable, attack by the Senator from Massachusetts made upon those who occupy the position I do myself; and I take great pleasure in adding that the course he has seen proper to pursue has not before been taken by any one since I have had the honor of a seat in this Chamber.

Mr. BRUCE. Mr. President——

Mr. CONKLING. I understand from the Senator from Mississippi that he prefers not to proceed to-day; therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 30, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

APPROVAL OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. ROBINSON. I am recorded in the Journal as not voting yesterday on the passage of House bill 2817, to regulate the pay and allowances for forage and quarters of Army officers. I was present and voted for the bill.

The SPEAKER. The correction will be made.

The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

NORTH AND SOUTH ALABAMA RAILROAD.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2939) for the relief of settlers on lands claimed by the North and South Alabama Railroad; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

E. O'M. CONDON.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I ask unanimous consent to present, to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, a memorial and joint resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky in relation to E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, imprisoned by the British government for a political offense.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I suggest that this paper ought to go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as it relates to a person held by the government of Great Britain.

Mr. BLACKBURN. It relates to a naturalized citizen of the United States; and there is a doubt in my mind whether it does not raise an important constitutional question. It was this that induced me to indicate the Committee on the Judiciary. I have, however, no choice in the matter, and I accept the suggestion of my colleague, [Mr. JONES,] assuming that if the Committee on Foreign Affairs find it necessary they will report back the paper and let it go to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the memorial and joint resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, as petitioners, would respectfully represent that E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, is now held by the government of Great Britain as a prisoner for a political offense which there is no proof that he ever committed.

Convicted with indecent haste upon testimony which even the law reporters for the British press felt constrained to protest against in a memorial to the English home office as lame, impotent, and inconclusive, the death penalty at first adjudged against him was changed to even a harsher doom: imprisonment for life.

It is an indisputable fact that Condon is a citizen of the United States, and as such has periled his life in defense of the Republic under that flag which we now invoke for his protection.

Your petitioners would respectfully insist that it is due to the dignity of the American Government, the honor of the American name, and the protection of the American citizen that such measures at once be taken as will effect the release of our fellow-citizen, now languishing in a felon's cell because of an alleged political offense against a foreign power.

We ask for the Irish Condon the same decisive action which, in the case of the Austrian Koszta, won the plaudits of our people and extorted the admiration of the civilized world; action evidencing not only the power but the promptness of the American Government to protect American citizens from oppression, wherever they might be.

We ask similar action to that by which the crew of the Virginius were rescued from Spanish prisons and indemnity coerced for the victims of Spanish butchery. Must we believe that it is because Spain is weak and Great Britain mighty the Department of State was so swift and bold as to the one and is so timid and tardy as to the other?

American citizenship is entitled to the protection of the American Government as well against the mighty as against the weak; and the same principles of honor and justice which required from Spain the surrender of the Virginius and its crew unite to make it imperative upon the American Government to demand of Great Britain the surrender of the American citizen, the American soldier, E. O'M. Condon.

And to this end we pray for such measures as Congress in its wisdom shall deem most appropriate and effective.

Resolution in relation to E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, imprisoned by the British government for a political offense.

Whereas information has reached this body that E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States, is held in imprisonment by the British government for a political offense; and whereas a memorial from his fellow-countrymen, citizens of this State, has been presented in his behalf:

Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That our Senators in Congress be directed and our Representatives requested to take such steps as in their judgment may be best to secure the interposition of the Federal Government in behalf of said prisoner and tend to his restoration to freedom and his return to his adopted country.

Resolved, That these resolutions, together with the memorial herewith, be printed, and that the governor be requested to forward copies of the same to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

W. J. STONE,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
JNO. C. UNDERWOOD,
Speaker of the Senate.

Approved March 20, 1876.

JAMES B. McCREARY.

By the governor:

J. STODDARD JOHNSTON,
Secretary of State.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU TO WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. SPARKS. Mr. Speaker, two bills relating to the transfer of the control of Indian affairs from the Interior Department to the War Department—House bills No. 2592 and No. 2677—were fixed as special orders for to-day. I move that those bills be made special orders for Tuesday next after the morning hour, to have the same relation to other business that they now have.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

LAND TITLE IN SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. PIPER. The bill (H. R. No. 2692) to relinquish the title of the United States to certain property in the city and county of San Francisco, California, and the bill (S. No. 130) to relinquish the interests of the United States in certain lands in the city and county of San Francisco, in the State of California, were inadvertently referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I ask that the reference may be changed and that these bills be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

SEWELL B. CORBETT.

Mr. CABELL. The bill (H. R. No. 2834) for the relief of Sewell B. Corbett, of Virginia, which was reported from the Committee on War Claims, was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Subsequent investigation has led me to believe that the report is in part improper. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and that it be recommitted to the Committee on War Claims.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

ASA MORSE.

Mr. BRADLEY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2940) granting a pension to Asa Morse, of Stanton, Michigan, late a private in Company B, One hundred and seventy-first Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteer Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES F. ZEDIKER.

Mr. CROUNSE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2941) granting increased pension to James F. Zediker, late a captain in the Twelfth Regiment Iowa Infantry Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

INDIANS' TITLES TO LANDS GRANTED FOR RAILROADS.

Mr. GUNTER, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2942) repealing and declaring void certain sections of certain acts named therein; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A. C. SEARLE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana. The Committee of Accounts, to whom was referred the petition of A. C. Searle for payment of services as page of this House during the months of December and January last, have had the same under consideration, and have directed me to report it back and move that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSENGER OF COMMITTEE ON FREEDMAN'S BANK.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the special messenger and watchman of the Committee on Investigation of the Freedman's Savings and Trust Company be allowed $3.60 per day from the date of his appointment.

MARTHA E. COSBY.

Mr. KNOTT, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2943) for the relief of Martha E. Cosby, widow of Charles Cosby, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF LAND TAX IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the refunding of the land tax collected in the Southern States under the act of Congress imposing direct taxes, approved the — day of ——, 1862, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

ELIZA CEVILL.

Mr. WALSH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2944) granting a pension to Mrs. Eliza Cevill; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

POST-MARK AND CANCELING-STAMP.

Mr. O'BRIEN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2945) to give the Postmaster-General power to use a uniform canceling-ink, and to provide every post-office with a post-mark and canceling-stamp; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

AARON B. HUGHES.

Mr. SHEAKLEY introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2946) granting a pension to Aaron B. Hughes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

DELEGATES APPOINTED TO COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appoints the following Delegates to be members of the following committees, in pursuance of the order of the House yesterday:

Mr. STEELE, of Wyoming, on the Committee on Indian Affairs;
Mr. MAGINNIS, of Montana, on the Committee on Mines and Mining;
Mr. KIDDER, of Dakota, on the Committee on Public Lands.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 2262) establishing post-roads; when the Speaker signed the same.

MORNING HOUR.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at thirty-two minutes after twelve o'clock, and the call of committees for business of a public nature rests with the Committee on Military Affairs.

SALE OF THE ARSENAL AND LOT AT STONINGTON, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. TERRY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut, with the recommendation that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After the word "advertisement" insert the words "for at least one month;" so it will read:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to sell for cash, after such advertisement, for at least one month, as he may deem necessary, either by public auction or by inviting proposals for the purchase thereof, and in either case to the highest responsible bidder, a certain lot and parcel of land, with the buildings thereon, in the town of Stonington, Connecticut, belonging to the United States and formerly used for arsenal purposes, &c.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. BANNING. Other members of the Committee on Military Affairs having reports to make are unavoidably absent, and I would ask the Chair whether when they come in they can have the privilege of submitting their reports?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection their reports can be received.

ANNUAL ESTIMATES OF EXPENDITURES, NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. BURLEIGH, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1344) directing method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from Navy Department, with amendments.

The SPEAKER. The amendments to the bill are numerous but appear to be merely verbal, and if there be no objection they will be voted on together.

Mr. BURLEIGH. They are merely verbal amendments, and I ask they be concurred in, and then that the bill be read as amended.

The amendments were concurred in.

The bill was then read, as amended, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3666 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended so that, in addition to the estimates required to be made by that section, the estimates required by the Department of the Navy for the following purposes shall be given in detail, namely:

UNDER HEAD OF PAY OF THE NAVY.

First, the number of officers in each rank on the active and retired list, with their annual pay:

Second, the number of petty officers, the number of seamen, ordinary seamen, landsmen, and boys, with their rate of pay;

Third, the items making the contingent fund under this head shall be in separate estimated amounts;

Fourth, the items required for support of civil establishment at navy-yards and stations shall be in separate estimated amounts for each yard, and shall designate the service, labor, materials, and the number and grade of officers, clerks, writers, laborers, or employés required therefor.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF NAVIGATION.

The items required for expenditures to be made by or under order of said Bureau shall be given separately, and estimates so made, and for each yard.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF ORDNANCE.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for fuel, tools, materials, labor, repairs, experiments, and where to be made, purchase of ordnance, ordnance-stores, and for armament of vessels, shall be given separately, and estimates so made of same.

UNDER HEAD OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for coal for steamers' and ships' use, for transportation, for storage, for labor, for materials, for all articles of equipment, and items of expense of any character, shall be given separately, and estimates so made, and for materials, labor, and service at each navy-yard separately.

UNDER HEAD OF YARDS AND DOCKS.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for freights and transportation of materials and stores, printing and stationery, machinery, use of patents, repairs of each description, purchase and maintenance of oxen, horses, and driving teams, labor, and all items of expense of any character attaching to or required by this Bureau, shall be separately given, and estimates so made, and for each navy-yard and station separately.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY.

The expenditures required in this Bureau shall be given separately, and estimates so made.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for provisions for officers, seamen, and marines, as well as each class of expenses, shall be separately given, and estimates so made.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF CONSTRUCTION AND REPAIR.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary, estimating for each vessel by name; the purchase of materials and stores of all kinds, stating the proposed use in detail; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations, stating the class and number of clerks, writers, and laborers, and amount of per diem proposed, and in each navy-yard and station separately; for purchase of tools, wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, building of any new vessel, and any other item of expense under said Bureau, shall be separately given, and estimates so made.

UNDER HEAD OF BUREAU OF STEAM ENGINEERING.

The expenditures required in this Bureau for repairs and preservation of machinery, boilers, &c., on naval vessels, for labor in the navy-yards, for materials, stores, and supplies, and construction of boilers, and incidental expenses, shall be separately given, and for each navy-yard, and estimates so made.

UNDER HEAD OF NAVAL ACADEMY.

The expenditures required at the Naval Academy for pay of professors, clerks, employés, watchmen, and others, repairs, and improvements, heating and lighting, incidental and contingent expenses, shall be separately given, and estimates so made.

UNDER HEAD OF MARINE CORPS.

The expenditures required for the pay, support, and maintenance of the Marine Corps, together with the incidental and contingent expenses thereof, shall be separately given, classified, and estimates so made.

SEC. 2. That the appropriations made for one class or item of expenditures shall not be otherwise used or expended than is therein and thereby directed.

The question recurred on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Maine will make some explanation of this bill before it is put upon its passage.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Mr. Speaker, it has been the custom of the Secretary of the Navy, until the last year or two, to send to the House detailed, itemized estimates of the expenditures of that Department. The bill heretofore embraced about one hundred pages of our usual size. Last year it was reduced to about twelve or thirteen pages. The items were condensed. At that time, in the interest of economy and in the interest of Congress, having a supervision over the expenditures of the Navy, and in the interest of the great party to which I belong, I called the attention of Congress to this fact. Then neither side of the House sustained me; I suppose probably because the House thought it too late to radically change a bill submitted to the House by the Committee on Appropriations. That objection does not obtain as against this bill to day, and I trust we shall have for it a large, or I may say a unanimous vote, tending as I believe it does toward the object at which we all aim, economy in the public expenditure.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Mr. Speaker, I may be permitted to remark that I had the honor to introduce the original bill which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs and was by that committee reported back with sundry amendments, which have just been adopted by the House.

I take pleasure in stating that my attention was first called to what I regarded as defects in existing laws relating to this matter by my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BURLEIGH.] I remember during the last session of Congress, or the session previous to that, that in very earnest words he called attention to what he regarded as an abuse. That abuse was that, in half a dozen lines, and without any particular attention being directed to what should be the specific uses of a given appropriation, a sum of $3,000,000 was appropriated, the control of which was either in the head of a Bureau or in the Secretary of the Navy.

Now, turning to what has been the practice in the last few years, although it had not been so heretofore, I have to call the attention of the House and of the country to the fact that in the space of some five or six pages only in the estimates submitted by the Secretary of the Treasury an expenditure of the public money is called for exceeding in amount $18,000,000. In view of what is notorious to the country as being, I am at liberty to say, at least an extravagant abuse, by the Bureau of Construction and Repair, of the appropriations heretofore made by the Congress of the United States, and to show that they are enabled to commit this very great abuse in the first place owing to the want of watchfulness on the part of the legislators of the country, I desire the attention of the House for a moment while I read from the estimate submitted at the present time by the Secretary of the Navy through the Secretary of the Treasury for this Bureau of Construction and Repair:

Preservation of vessels on the stocks and in ordinary; purchase of materials and stores of all kinds; labor in navy-yards and on foreign stations; preservation of material; purchase of tools; wear, tear, and repair of vessels afloat, and general maintenance of the Navy; incidental expenses, advertising, and foreign postages.

Now may I ask, sir, taking the words of this estimate, how much shall the Secretary of the Navy or the head of this Bureau expend upon "labor in navy-yards?" Shall he, under cover of the words there used, turn loose over two millions or two and a half millions of dollars in the employment of labor at the navy-yards? Shall it be used in the repair of old vessels? Shall it be used in building new ones? Shall it be in the construction of vessels? Shall it be in the repair of vessels? Shall it be for "incidental expenses?" For what purpose shall it be?

Sir, you have put no limit or control whatever on the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. That such a limit should be imposed on his discretion is, in my humble judgment, evident from the fact that millions and millions of dollars have been recklessly if not criminally abused under appropriations which are covered by these general terms.

Sir, may I turn to another estimate here where general terms are employed? I turn to the item "Contingent, Bureau of Provisions and Clothing:"

Candles; for fuel; for books and blanks; for stationery; for telegrams and express charges; for tolls, ferriages, and car tickets; for ice; and for incidental labor not chargeable to other appropriations, $60,000.

How much of that is to be paid for car tickets; and how much for ice? Shall it be $40,000 for the one item, and $10,000 for the other? What control do you place over the parties to whom you commit the responsibility of disbursing the public money?

But, Mr. Speaker, it may be said that we require too much when we ask of the heads of these Bureaus that they shall itemize their expenditures. I ask your attention to this book which I hold in my hand. It is the navy estimates for the naval establishment of Great Britain. Look at this large book, as I hold it in my hand turning over its pages, and then look at the Book of Estimates submitted for your entire public service. One is almost as large as the other. And yet gentlemen say that we do too much in requiring that the heads of these Bureaus, the men in whose hands you place millions of dollars, shall itemize. Let us look for a moment at these estimates made for the British naval establishment. You find there the number of workmen, the number of employés, the number of laborers in each and every navy-yard of Great Britain. And, turning to the officers, you find them set forth rank by rank and class by class, the numbers of each being given. Do we do that in our service? Can you tell the number of officers of one class or the number of officers of another class from these estimates? Do you know how many admirals there are, how many commodores, how many captains, how many lieutenants, how many sergeants in the Marine Corps—how many corporals, how many of this class or that class of officers?

Then, sir, going beyond that, it is said, or may be urged, that when you go into the navy-yard establishments of the country it is too much to require of them that they shall name the purpose for which you are asked to make the appropriations in every case. I read again from the British naval estimates, taking the naval establishment at Chatham and the estimates there submitted:

Charge platform for iron foundery.
Additional water-closet for mill-wright shop.
Additional urinal near the iron foundery.
Clearing harbor of mud.
Ladder-iron at No. 2 dock, (in new part of yard.)
Repairing traveler-beams, Nos. 3 and 4 docks.
Roof for trimming-shop in iron foundery.
Shed for traction and locomotive engines.

And here are other items going down to the very minutest detail.

This is required and performed in the naval establishment of Great Britain. Why might it not be done here? Sir, in my humble judgment, if the reform, which may not be perfect, initiated here by the Committee on Naval Affairs shall enter every branch of the public service, you will then have the means in your own hands to detect frauds, robbery, and abuses. As it is now you do not have it. The committee who are charged with the investigation of the affairs of the Navy Department were at a loss, in setting out in their investigations, to know how the accounts had been opened and how kept. If you will enable future Congresses, by requiring of all public servants charged with the disbursement or expenditure of public money that they shall first submit to Congress an item and the purpose for which they want the item, and then hold them to their demand and see that they do not go beyond it, you will enable Congress to put a stop to frauds and abuses.

Sir, may I allude to an abuse existing in this very Department of which I am talking? Do I go too far when I ask of my colleagues on the committee if it is not true that it has been the habit, the constant, repeated habit, in the Navy Department to transfer an appropriation made for one service to another? Do I go too far when I intimate on this floor that the deposit made by the Navy Department with Jay Cooke & Co. was a scandal to the country? Do I go too far when I say that it arose from a transfer of funds authorized by the Secretary of the Navy and done under his order that that scandal and reproach were brought upon the country? Shall it be prevented hereafter, by reforming the mode of making estimates and requiring that hereafter, they shall estimate for what they do want, and when Congress makes an appropriation for that purpose that the amount shall not be diverted from the purpose for which Congress intended it.

Sir, it was to correct this great abuse, I was almost tempted to say crime, that the Committee on Naval Affairs have been induced to make this report.

In these few hurried words I have endeavored as briefly as I might to explain the object and purpose of the committee in submitting this bill for, I hope, the favorable action of the House.

I yield now to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, this is a most important bill. It is a bill the salutary effect of which can hardly be overstated. In the first place the Committee on Appropriations should have this information under the authority of law. As it is now, the Committee on Appropriations have found it necessary to make a demand for these itemized estimates on the various Departments of the Government in order to a correct understanding of the requirements of the money asked for, and I hope that every Department of the Government will be made to comply in the method of itemized estimates in the future with what is now proposed to be required by this bill of the Naval Department. The saving of time, the saving of labor, in addition to the correct formation of all the appropriation bills, will be very great if this bill is adopted as to the Naval Department, and if we should adopt some measure of a like character in reference to the War Department we should find that this lump mode of appropriations would be done away with and immense economy be reached.

Under the present system take for instance the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, which we have now under consideration in Committee of the Whole; why, sir, if we had got itemized accounts, as is proposed in this bill as to the Navy Department, for the various matters embraced in this bill, we should have had the bill before the House a month before it was introduced. If this bill be passed, it will expedite the labors of the Committee on Appropriations on the naval appropriation bill, and we are permitted to ask of the Navy Department correct estimates as provided for in this bill.

What the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] states is correct, that it is almost impossible in this aggregate manner of estimates for appropriations to the extent of millions of dollars to discriminate as to what our judgment deems right and what we might consider to be wrong. We have attempted, it is true, to get these itemized accounts from the Navy Department and also from the War Department, but this to my mind is the most practicable, far-reaching, and correct system that I have yet heard of in connection with these Departments. I hope therefore not only that this bill will pass, but that every Department of the Government will be required to conform to the mode of estimating as provided for in this bill with reference to the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I see no reason why the administration of the Navy Department may not be properly conducted under this bill. It is in the right direction. It is in the direction in which all the estimates and appropriations have run during the existence of the Government, and that is to more and more particularize. I have not had time to examine fully the bill offered by my colleague, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] and now before the House, but so far as I have looked into it I see little in it that is objectionable. I only wish that other committees would go to the same extent that the Committee on Naval Affairs has here gone.

And lest gentlemen who have not examined these subjects may believe that the Navy Department particularly has sent in gross estimates upon which appropriations have been made, let me say that other Departments have done the same thing, and even to a greater extent than the Navy Department. If gentlemen will turn to the Book of Estimates, which I now have before me, and examine those for the War Department, they will find a single item for the Quartermaster's Department larger than any one item in the estimates for the Navy Department, with which so much fault is found here. They will find that this single item appropriated for in gross in the appropriation bill for the War Department amounts to $4,250,000. They will also find that the single estimate for incidental expenses, which expenses are not itemized, amounts to $1,200,000. Under the head of Army transportation, they will find that estimates have been made and that appropriations have followed in the gross amount of $4,000,000 in the annual appropriation bill. Under the head of "Barracks and Quarters," they will find that one and a half millions have been appropriated. If their curiosity leads them to examine the Book of Estimates still further they will find that we have appropriated in gross for the Internal-Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department, under one head, $2,300,000 for the pay and expenses of supervisors, agents, surveyors, gaugers, store-keepers, and for the much and deservedly disliked generality, "miscellaneous expenditures."

If they will turn further to the estimates for the Department of Justice they will find that estimates have been made of $2,000,000 for the payment of judgments of the Court of Claims, and appropriations have followed, not to that amount, but for hundreds of thousands of dollars. For the single item of running the courts there have been estimates made and appropriations following in the gross to the amount of $3,000,000.

Therefore there is no fairness in any impression being given—I do not say that any one has attempted to do so—but there is no fairness in any impression being received that in this regard the Navy Department has been especially reckless and careless or not subject to proper scrutiny. That is not so; the evil runs through all the Departments of the Government. The sooner and the more effectually it is remedied, the better.

While I am upon this question of particularizing the estimates for appropriations, I desire to say a few words more. It is an interesting subject to study: how, beginning with the first annual appropriation bill, which covered the expenses of all the departments of the Government, these being for twenty years comprehended in a single annual appropriation bill, to be found in all early volumes of the Statutes at Large—it is a curious and interesting thing to see how those appropriations, instead of being compacted, have been broken up, have been separated, have been itemized.

I hold in my hand a volume containing the single appropriation bill for the year succeeding July, 1789. It is a bill of only thirteen printed lines, and contains a single long item. That was the only appropriation bill for the whole year. Following along later than that, I find a single appropriation bill covering the expenses of all the branches of the Government, Army, Navy, diplomatic intercourse, the expenses of the Treasury Department and of the judicial department, the expenses of every department of the Government in a single appropriation bill of three pages.

So it continued, and the course of events was in the direction of this bill of my colleague, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] an improvement. After awhile each Department submitted estimates, and appropriations were made particularly. I have here what I believe to be the first, or one of the first, naval appropriation bills. Now when gentlemen are led to believe that the Navy Department, or in fact any Department, has been compacting its estimates of its expenditures, it is worth the while to look, as an illustration, to the first, or one of the first, naval appropriation bills. I have here the one for the year 1800, to be found in volume 2 of the Statutes at Large. It is an appropriation bill for the entire annual expenditures of the Navy Department, and it is upon a single page of this volume, occupying about two-thirds of the page. It contains the entire appropriation for the Navy Department for that year, amounting to $2,482,953.

Following down later I find that the good work of itemizing began, and that each year some items of expenditure were separated. But for the next twenty-five or thirty years I do not find any appropriation bill covering more than two or three printed pages. Here is another naval appropriation bill, occupying the part of one page and a part of the next. So on down even as late as 1860 I find the naval appropriation bill, with all the amendments added thereto in the nature of legislation, covering only four pages of a volume of the Statutes at Large.

The truth is that these expenditures have been, as they should be, more and more itemized from time to time, except perhaps that there may have been particular cases where it was thought that discretion as to the expenditure of the funds should be placed in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy. But, generally speaking, the naval appropriation bill has been separated, been spread out so that daylight could be let into it, rather than the reverse. If gentlemen will look at the naval appropriation bills for the last few years they will find that to be generaliy the case. That is one reason why the Book of Estimates for this year, which I hold in my hand, is so much larger than it was fifteen years ago.

I remember that the former chairman of the Committee on Appropriations at one time held up two Books of Estimates of different years, citing the increased size as a result of the increase of expenditure, when in fact, if he had been a little deeper in his criticism, he would have seen that the increase in size resulted from separating items and expenditures.

Now I have had no consultation upon this point with the head of the Department; but from having some familiarity with naval appropriation bills for the last half-dozen years, I know that he can run his Department on this bill of my colleague and that he will try to do so. He can run his Department on the appropriations that Congress makes. I know his position is that it is not his Navy; it is our Navy. The appropriations are not settled by him but by us. The manner of itemizing is not to be settled by him but by us. Therefore I have not arisen for the purpose of opposing my colleague's bill, but only to call attention to the fact that other Departments are running in the same way, and that in general, treated historically, the direction of estimates of appropriation has been right instead of wrong. It has been to separate rather than to aggregate.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I desire to ask my colleague a question before he sits down. I made the statement that last year the estimates of expenditures in the Navy, as embraced in the appropriation bill presented to the House, were very much reduced from what they had been in previous years. Does not my colleague recollect that they covered about one-eighth as much space last year as they did the year previous, or the two previous years?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman refer to the space in the bill?

Mr. BURLEIGH. The space in the appropriation bill as it came to the House with the estimates.

Mr. HALE. Does my colleague refer to the space occupied by the estimates, or by the bill as it passed Congress? The two are distinct, of course.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The bill as it came before Congress and passed last year was but fifteen pages, while the year before the corresponding bill was one hundred pages long. Does not my colleague recollect it?

Mr. HALE. I certainly have no recollection of that kind.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The bills will show for themselves.

Mr. HALE. I never reported a naval appropriation bill of one hundred pages; and I never reported any two naval appropriation bills with any such difference as my colleague seems to think existed. I would like to ask my colleague a question. What items were consolidated in the bill of last year, and separated the year before?

Mr. BURLEIGH. The civil items were consolidated; the items for construction and repairs were consolidated.

Mr. HALE. Not last year.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I beg my colleague's pardon.

Mr. HALE. How had it been before?

Mr. BURLEIGH. It was divided among the different yards, in my opinion; I cannot say positively.

Mr. HALE. For twenty-five years the general appropriation for the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting has been found in one place; not divided around among the several yards.

Mr. BURLEIGH. There is no use for us to dispute about this. The record will show for itself.

Mr. HALE. And that is the very thing to which I would refer my colleague before he asks any more questions.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will remind the gentleman from Maine that the morning hour is nearly out.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Then I call the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. I want, I suppose, but five minutes; I shall not exhaust the patience of the gentleman or of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine can yield for a short time.

Mr. KASSON. I will return the floor to the gentleman in time for him to call the previous question; or, if he so desires, I will call it myself.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I yield to the gentleman for five minutes.

Mr. KASSON. When I sought the attention of the House for a moment in order to get an opportunity to obtain the bill and examine it, I did so chiefly with reference to what I understood to be the effect of the second section of the bill. The main purport of the bill I heartily agree to; I have no dissent to make from it.

From the second section, however, a difficulty will I fear arise in practice under the bill as I understand it. That section provides that "the appropriations made for one class or item of expenditures shall not be otherwise used or expended than as herein and hereby directed." Then the body of the bill, if I am not mistaken, requires that estimates be made for each navy-yard, including the repairs to machinery and the repairs to vessels. The operation of that provision, if I construe it rightly, will not be consistent with the safe or economical administration of the Navy Department, because, when you come to the question of repairs—the need for them resulting as it often does from diasters at sea and along the coast—you must allow your vessels to resort to the most convenient navy-yards in order to obtain the necessary repairs. If the appropriation should be exhausted at one navy-yard, they must, under this bill, go from navy-yard to navy-yard until they find one at which the specific appropriation is not exhausted.

The object of the bill will be accomplished fully by such a proviso as will enable that class of expenditures to be disbursed at the most convenient navy-yard. I ask the gentleman whether I am not correct in my construction?

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman from Iowa labors under a misapprehension; for, if he will turn to the paragraph under the head of "Bureau of Construction and Repairs," he will see it is made the duty of that Bureau to estimate whatever sum may be needed for the preservation and repair of vessels. They do not enter into the expenditures for navy-yards.

Mr. KASSON. I see under the head of "Yards and Docks" that the expenditures required in this Bureau were so and so, and then all items of expense of any character attaching to or required by this Bureau shall be separately given, and estimates so made, and for each navy-yard and station separately. So also, under the head of "Bureau of Steam-Engineering," on the fourth page of the bill, I find that the expenditures requred in this Bureau for repairs and preservation of machinery, boilers, &c., on naval vessels, for labor in the navy-yards, for materials, stores, and supplies, and construction of boilers, and incidental expenses, shall be separately given, and for each navy-yard, and estimates so made. I find it does seem to limit this kind of expenditures to specific yards, and creates the difficulty to which I have referred.

Let me make a suggestion to the chairman of the committee, if he is not confident I misconstrue the provision, whether it would not be better to add a proviso that any amount appropriated for repair of vessels and machinery may be disbursed at any navy-yard or station which may be most conveniently located for that purpose. With that provision I think the danger I speak of will be obviated.

Mr. WITTHORNE. The gentleman from Iowa does not understand the mode of these expenditures in navy-yards. Whatever is to be done under the head of "Yards and Docks" is appropriated for specifically, and all expenditures for repair and preservation of vessels are provided for under the head of "Construction and Repair." If a vessel reaches Charleston or Norfolk for repairs the expenditure for those repairs does not come out of the appropriation for yards and docks, but out of the appropriation under the head of the "Bureau of Construction and Repair." Whatever repairs are made upon a vessel reaching Charleston or Norfolk are made under order of the proper Bureau, and the expenditure comes out of the fund set apart by appropriation for that Bureau.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman is mistaken, I think, in this. I do understand that to be the mode practiced by the Department heretofore. If that should continue to be practiced the gentleman would be right, and I would be wrong. My point is that by the provisions of this bill, when the appropriations come to be made in accordance with them, that practice is changed. Under the head of the Bureau of Steam Engineering it is provided that the expenditures required in this Bureau for repairs and preservation of machinery, boilers, &c., on naval vessels, for labor in the navy-yards, for materials, stores, and supplies, and construction of boilers, and incidental expenses, shall be separately given, and for each navy-yard, and estimates so made. I should like to have permission to submit my amendment.

Mr. BURLEIGH. My time is very nearly out. If the gentleman's amendment should be admitted and adopted, it will defeat, in my judgment, the whole purpose of this bill.

Mr. KASSON. Then the gentleman differs from the chairman of the committee.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I demand the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I ask my colleague to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have not time.

Mr. HALE. It will only take half a minute. I have the appropriations bills the gentleman referred to as different in bulk.

Mr. BURLEIGH. They are not in the same size of print, and you cannot register the number of pages so as to make a comparison.

Mr. HALE. They are the same print, and for each year; the bill occupies seven pages of the printed volume of appropriatons. That for the year before last is found in the same book, and occupies but seven pages.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I did not say two years ago or one year ago, but three years ago.

Mr. HALE. I have that one here also, and the number of lines is less than the year succeeding.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BURLEIGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. FAULKNER, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be instructed to inquire if there be any conflict of construction between the government of Great Britain and the United States in reference to the extradition treaty of 1842, and whether, if any, what legislation is proper by Congress to remove any difficulties, if such exist, in the execution of said treaty; and the committee is authorized to call upon the Secretary of State for all recent correspondence touching the subject of this inquiry.

CITIZENSHIP.

Mr. FAULKNER also, from the same committee, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 2245) to carry into execution the provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution concerning citizenship, and to define certain rights of citizens of the United States in foreign countries and certain duties of diplomatic and consular officers, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read in extenso.

Mr. COX. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. COX. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] desires to make a request of the House.

Mr. COX. I object to the consideration of that bill now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from West Virginia does not propose to ask the House to consider it now. He desires to make a request of the House.

Mr. FAULKNER. It will have been seen that this bill is of considerable importance, and several members have urged me not to press its consideration at this time. I ask that it be made a special order for Saturday two weeks, after the morning hour.

Mr. COX. I would ask if this is the same bill which was in the House two years ago?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is not the same. There are considerable modifications.

Mr. COX. It is a bill which proposes to register and have a police supervision over our people who go abroad.

The SPEAKER. To what day does the gentleman desire to have the consideration of the bill assigned?

Mr. FAULKNER. Saturday, the 15th of April.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill if it will then be open to amendment?

Mr. FAULKNER. Certainly.

There was no objection, and the bill was made a special order for Saturday, the 15th of April, after the morning hour.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that the bill be reprinted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to make a privileged report. The Committee on the Judiciary having had under consideration the resolution of the House directing them to prepare and report articles in support of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, have directed me to report such articles and an accompanying resolution for the action of the House. I ask that the report be printed and recommitted, and I give notice that I shall call it up for action at a convenient hour on the day after to-morrow. I presume it will be unnecessary to occupy the time of the House in reading those lengthy articles. I move that they be printed for the use of the House and recommitted to the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I ask, also, that they be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, having had under consideration the resolution of the House directing them to prepare and report articles in support of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, for high crimes and misdemeanors in office, respectfully report the following articles and accompanying resolutions for the action of the House:

Resolved, That the following articles be adopted and presented to the Senate, in maintenance and support of the impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors in office of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

ARTICLE I.

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; that thereafter, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, the said Caleb P. Marsh and one John S. Evans entered into an agreement in writing substantially as follows, to wit:

"Articles of agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October, A. D. 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

"Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from General William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, by permission and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of post-trader as aforesaid solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

"Now, therefore, said John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York aforesaid; said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable, unless increased or reduced in amount, in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

"First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid shall be increased or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto. The above rule laid down for the continuation of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as this agreement shall remain in force and effect.

"Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War aforesaid shall sign the commission of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

"Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretary of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of post-trader at Fort Sill.

"Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business as post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid solely on his own responsibility and in his own name, it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

"Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals, the day and year first above written.

"JOHN S. EVANS. [SEAL.]
"C. P. MARSH. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—
"E. T. BARTLETT."

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500, in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time; whereby the said William W. Belknap, who was then Secretary of War as aforesaid, was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE II.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 4th day of November, 1873, willfully, corruptly, and unlawfully take and receive from one Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, in consideration that he would continue to permit one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, which said establishment said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, was authorized by law to permit to be maintained at said military post, and which the said Evans had been before that time appointed by said Belknap to maintain; and that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, for said consideration, did corruptly permit the said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post. And so the said Belknap was thereby guilty, while he was Secretary of War, of a high misdemeanor in his said office.

ARTICLE III.

That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretary of War until the 2d day of March, 1876; that as Secretary of War as aforesaid said Belknap had authority, under the laws of the United States, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, not in the vicinity of any city or town; that on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; and that said John S. Evans, by virtue of said appointment, has since, till the 2d day of March, 1876, maintained a trading establishment at said military post, and that said Evans, on the 8th day of October, 1870, before he was so appointed to maintain said trading establishment as aforesaid, and in order to procure said appointment and to be continued therein, agreed with one Caleb P. Marsh that, in consideration that said Belknap would appoint him, the said Evans, to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, at the instance and request of said Marsh, he, the said Evans, would pay to him a large sum of money, quarterly, in advance, from the date of his said appointment by said Belknap, to wit, $12,000 during the year immediately following the 10th day of October, 1870, and other large sums of money, quarterly, during each year that he, the said Evans, should be permitted by said Belknap to maintain said trading establishment at said post; that said Evans did pay to said Marsh said sum of money quarterly during each year after his said appointment, until the month of December, 1875, when the last of said payments was made; that said Marsh, upon the receipt of each of said payments, paid one-half thereof to him, the said Belknap. Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time, and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War, and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service.

Whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE IV.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office and acting as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, on the 10th day of October, 1870, in the exercise of the power and authority vested in him as Secretary of War as aforesaid by law, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, and he, the said Belknap, did receive, from one Caleb P. Marsh, large sums of money for and in consideration of his having so appointed said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and for continuing him therein, whereby he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in his said office.

Specification 1.—On or about the 2d day of November, 1870, said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 2.—On or about the 17th day of January, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and for continuing him therein.

Specification 3.—On or about the 18th day of April, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 4.—On or about the 25th day of July, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 5.—On or about the 10th day of November, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 6.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 7.—On or about the 13th day of June, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 8.—On or about the 22d day of November, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 9.—On or about the 28th day of April, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,000, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 10.—On or about the 16th day of June, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,700, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 11.—On or about the 4th day of November, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 12.—On or about the 22d day of January, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 13.—On or about the 10th day of April, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 14.—On or about the 9th day of October, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 15.—On or about the 24th day of May, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 16.—On or about the 17th day of November, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 17.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1876, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $750, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

ARTICLE V.

That one John S. Evans was, on the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, appointed by the said Belknap to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and said Belknap did, from that day continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876, permit said Evans to maintain the same; and said Belknap was induced to make said appointment by the influence and request of one Caleb P. Marsh; and said Evans paid to said Marsh, in consideration of such influence and request and in consideration that he should thereby induce said Belknap to make said appointment, divers large sums of money at various times, amounting to about $12,000 a year from the date of said appointment to the 25th day of March, 1872, and to about $6,000 a year thereafter until the 2d day of March, 1876, all which said Belknap well knew; yet said Belknap did, in consideration that he would permit said Evans to continue to maintain said trading establishment and in order that said payments might continue and be made by said Evans to said Marsh as aforesaid, corruptly receive from said Marsh, either to his, the said Belknap's, own use or to be paid over to the wife of said Belknap, divers large sums of money at various times, namely: the sum of $1,500 on or about the 2d day of November, 1870; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of January, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 18th day of April, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 25th day of July, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of November, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 15th day of January, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 13th day of June, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of November, 1872; the sum of $1,000 on or about the 28th day of April, 1873; the sum of $1,700 on or about the 16th day of June, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 4th day of November, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of January, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of April, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 9th day of October 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 24th day of May, 1875; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of November, 1875; the sum of $750 on or about the 15th day of January, 1876; all of which acts and doings were while the said Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as aforesaid, and were a high misdemeanor in said office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles of accusation or impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William W. Belknap may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I am instructed by the Committee on Railways and Canals to report back the bill (H. R. No. 2798) to authorize the Washington, Cincinnati and Saint Louis Railroad Company to construct a narrow-gauge railway from tide-water to the cities of Saint Louis and Chicago, with a report by the committee favorable thereto, and to ask that the report may be printed, and that the House will fix a day for the consideration of the bill. I will suggest Tuesday, the 18th of April.

Mr. HOLMAN. It may be that this bill should go to the Committee of the Whole. I reserve points of order on it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky that the report be printed and that the consideration of the bill be assigned to Tuesday, the 18th of April.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ANDREW JOHNSON.

Mr. COX, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2947) for the relief of Andrew Johnson, of Logansport, Indiana; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SOUTHERN CLAIMS.

Mr. DOUGLAS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2948) to enable certain parties to have their claims re-opened and examined by the board of southern claims commissioners; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills and a joint resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein;

An act (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution;

An act (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians;

An act (H. R. No. 2821) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) for the relief of the Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians.

VISITORS TO THE MILITARY ACADEMY.

The SPEAKER. Under authority of law the Chair makes the following announcement: The Chair appoints the following members visitors to the Military Academy at West Point: Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS of Michigan, Mr. HARRIS of Georgia, and Mr. WHEELER of New York.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill in reference to the Printing and Engraving Bureau and the issue of subsidiary silver coin.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (Mr. COX in the chair as Speaker pro tempore) resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The pending question is on the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] for the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

The Clerk will first read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] as originally offered.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as section 3:

SEC. 3. That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment, and silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. OLIVER.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as section 3:

SEC. 3. That section 3586 of the Revised Statutes is hereby repealed, and the following enacted in lieu thereof, to wit:

SEC. 3586. The trade-dollar shall be a legal tender only to the amount of $1 in any one payment, and the fractional silver coinage shall be a legal tender only for an amount less than $1 in any one payment.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the last part of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] which is his modification of his original amendment, and which was offered yesterday, be read, that I may determine whether I desire my amendment to be considered as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Texas as modified or as a substitute for his original proposition only.

The Clerk read the modification proposed by Mr. REAGAN to his amendment yesterday, as follows:

Add to the end of the amendment the words "except for customs due to the United States .which shall be paid in gold, and except in satisfaction of contracts now existing and payable in gold.

Mr. RANDALL. How does that amendment come in?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a modification of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is certainly not in order; it is a further amendment now offered for the first time.

Mr. REAGAN. I submit that it is too late to make that objection now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the modification was allowed yesterday to come in.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it offered yesterday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was; and it is too late now to make the objection. The gentleman from Texas modified his amendment yesterday, as the Clerk informs the Chair.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it offered as a regular amendment or merely as a suggestion in the course of a speech?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman modified his amendment by adding the words which have been read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. I shall be glad to hear it read from the Journal, if the Journal shows the fact, for it is a very important amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman from Indiana was not in his seat at the time I made the modification.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that it was offered as a regular modification; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. OLIVER. I desire that my amendment shall be considered as pending as a substitute for the original proposition of the gentleman from Texas, and not as a substitute for the whole of his proposition as he has modified it. Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent on the friends of this measure in presenting it for the favorable consideration of this House to show two things: first, that it is feasible and, second, that it will be advantageous.

It is a fact that has been demonstrated by history, and which the friends of this bill do not dispute, that no currency can be kept in circulation in any country when that currency can be exported at a profit, and it is for that reason that the friends of the bill have felt that it was incumbent upon them to show that the bullion value of silver was so low that it would not be exported.

Sir, it will not be exported to England, for there it will not circulate as money. If it is put upon the market there it must be sold at its bullion value or melted and recoined. For that reason it will not be exported to England, it will not be exported to France, it will not be exported to Germany. But, sir, the friends of this bill forget that there are other countries where American silver circulates at par with gold—at a value 15 per cent. above its value in the United States, where, if it circulates at all, it must circulate at par with greenbacks. They forget that in Canada the silver coins of the United States circulate side by side with Canadian money; not at a greenback value, but at a gold value. Sir, will they show us what will prevent its exportation to Canada? Will they show us why it will not go over the border as rapidly as the avarice of man can carry it? In some of the islands of the West Indies I understand that American silver is the only silver money in circulation, the only fractional currency, and circulates there at a gold value—at a value of fifteen cents above the value at which you propose it shall circulate here. Will you tell us what will prevent its flying to those countries; tell us what will prevent its flying to the American countries south of us, where it circulates side by side with the coin of those countries at the value of gold?

Sir, I apprehend that nothing will and nothing which we can do can prevent it. I apprehend that it is impossible for us to reverse the laws of trade and commerce. It does not lie in the power of any American Congress to prevent it. It can only be done by the refusal of those countries to receive it, and that refusal is not probable. I warn the friends of this bill that they will see our silver depart from this country, and that in less than six months it will be necessary to resort again to paper as a fractional currency.

Mr. Speaker, there is another difficulty with this bill to which I desire to call the attention of its friends.

Mr. KELLEY. I would like to state a fact to the gentleman from Iowa just here.

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot yield if it comes out of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire only to say that the money articles in yesterday evening's papers report an export of $30,000 of silver coin yesterday.

Mr. OLIVER. As I said before, all history has demonstrated, as the friends of this bill have conceded, that it is impossible to keep money in circulation in any country at a lower value than that at which it will circulate abroad. It is equally impossible to compel American silver to circulate in this country at two different values; and that is what the friends of this bill propose to do. The standard of value in the Atlantic States is a greenback standard; the standard in the Pacific States is a gold standard. Now, sir, how is it possible to keep this American silver in circulation in the Atlantic States at a greenback value, or at eighty-six cents gold on the dollar greenbacks, when it circulates on the Pacific coast at $1 in gold, equal to about $1.15 greenbacks? It is an absolute impossibility. Your silver will fly to the Pacific States; it will flood every avenue of trade and commerce and compel the people of the Pacific States to resort either to greenbacks or to silver as a standard. They cannot maintain in circulation, side by side, two standards of value differing from each other fifteen cents on the dollar. The cheaper currency, silver, will inevitably drive out the dearer, gold, and thus, as a result of this bill, you will at once force the only part of your country where specie payments now exist to abandon them and accept your paper standard, and will deprive the Atlantic States, at least for a period, of the fractional circulation necessary to its business.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. OLIVER. I trust I shall be allowed a little more time, inasmuch as I was interrupted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has had his full five minutes.

Mr. REAGAN. As I regard the amendment which I have offered, as modified by me on yesterday, of some importance, I have sought the floor to oppose the substitute for it for the purpose of advocating my amendment.

The object of the second section of the bill under consideration is to substitute silver coin for fractional currency. And one of the reasons for that substitution, as I learn from the Committee on Appropriations, in addition to obtaining a circulating medium not so liable to wastage, loss, and counterfeiting, is to avoid the expenditure of some $1,400,000 for printing, taking in and re-issuing the paper fractional currency, in order to keep the country supplied with the necessary amount of it. The amendment I have offered is intended to aid the second section of this bill, and I would be glad to have the attention of members of the House to it for a few moments.

One of the objections urged against the substitution of silver coin for fractional currency is the want of value in the silver. I know also that it is argued that it is too valuable to be so used. But I shall first address myself to the argument of the want of value in silver to take the place of our fractional currency. I understand that it is now, and probably will remain, below the par of gold. But how are we to give it a value which will bring it to a proper standard in the money market and the business transactions of the country? We can do so by making it receivable in the payment of all debts and dues to some amount that will give it a commercial value. At present it is receivable in any one payment only to the amount of $5.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] proposes by his amendment to make the trade-dollar receivable in payments only to the amount of $1, and the silver coins of less denomination than $1 receivable in payments only to an amount less than $1. That proposition, if adopted, would practically and substantially drive our silver coins out of use as money, and keep in use this fractional currency at its reduced value as compared with gold, and at a cost to the people of $1,400,000 a year to print, take up, and re-issue the fractional currency, so as to keep in circulation an amount sufficient to supply the wants of the people.

On a former occasion I alluded to the fact, and I repeat it now, that our country is blessed with mines which annually develop almost countless millions of silver, which is converted into bullion and which may well be substituted for the fractional currency of the country if we are disposed to pursue a policy that will allow it to be utilized for that purpose. If we intend, as the committee propose, to make silver coin a substitute for fractional currency, then we ought by our legislation to give it its proper commercial value by making it receivable in such sums as will make it available in the ordinary business transactions of the country and bring it into demand. We should make it legal-tender for such an amount as will give it the value to which it is entitled on the authority of the Government, and which the stamping it with a given value, in addition to the intrinsic value of the metal, entitles it to receive in the commercial transactions of the country.

This is in accordance with the fact that silver is one part of the constitutional currency of this country. It was originally intended as, and is now by law, a part of the constitutional currency of the country. It is better for the business of the country, more stable in value, less expensive in its issue than the fractional paper currency now used. I do not know how to answer the arguments that are made on both sides against the use of silver for fractional currency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. OLIVER to the amendment of Mr. REAGAN; and it was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the bill of the Senate of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the country for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the silver-coin bill.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. REAGAN, to add to the bill the following:

SEC. 3. That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment; and silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment; except for customs due to the United States, which shall be paid in gold, and except in satisfaction of contracts now existing and payable in gold.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word on this amendment before it is voted upon. When upon the floor, a few moments ago, I was proceeding to answer the argument submitted by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] in favor of his amendment limiting the use of silver coin to $1 and less in any one payment. When the Speaker's hammer fell I was about calling attention to the fact that the argument of the gentleman was that silver, being so much more valuable as a currency in Canada and California, would be drawn away from other portions of the country. And then, if I understood the latter part of his argument, he said that silver was of so little value that it could not be used in place of fractional currency.

It leaves me in the same dilemma that I was left in on the first discussion of this bill, the arguments of some gentlemen being that silver was too valuable to be substituted for fractional currency, and of others that it was of too little value for that purpose. I do not know how to reconcile those arguments; I shall not undertake to reconcile them, but shall present the fact as evidence that neither proposition is correct, and that each overturns and contradicts the other.

It has been suggested to me, Mr. Speaker, that the modification which I have made in my amendment, so that silver shall not be receivable for customs dues, is not correct and may drive from the support of the amendment some gentlemen who would otherwise give it their votes. I deem it proper, therefore, to state the reasons which have induced me to make that modification.

The amendment as modified makes silver receivable in all private contracts unless expressly payable in gold, and for all Government dues except customs dues; receivable for the public lands, receivable for office fees, receivable for postage-stamps, receivable for internal revenue. Being thus receivable, it would call in silver to be distributed in payments among the people, without the embarrassments which, as I shall presently show, would result from receiving it in payment of customs dues.

I had hoped that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] authorizing the coinage of silver in the hands of private persons on their paying for the coinage, would be adopted. If that amendment had been agreed to, so that the silver bullion in the country might be coined at the expense of the owners and given an opportunity to circulate; and if in addition my amendment as now pending should be adopted, making silver coin receivable in all contracts and for all public dues except customs dues in sums of $25 or $50, as indicated, it would utilize this coinage; it would popularize it; it would make it practically the small currency of the country; it would substitute the small silver coins for the fractional notes, saving to the country an expense which I am informed is over $1,000,000, perhaps $1,400,000 annually, and giving us a currency of permanent and intrinsic value—a constitutional currency.

But the principal reason which induced me to make the exception, providing that the silver coinage should not be receivable for customs dues, was this: If we receive silver for customs dues in amounts of $50 or $25 in any one payment, the danger is that the silver would go largely into the payment of customs dues, amounting to nearly $200,000,000 a year, and would thus be taken out of use as fractional currency.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, after hearing the discussion on this bill and having given it as much deliberation as the time allowed, I have come to the conclusion that we ought to support it. It seems to be in furtherance of economy, and if it makes a step in the direction of specie payments without involving a depreciation of the industries and general business of the country, it would seem to be our duty to adopt it. I support it, sir, with all the more alacrity to show our opponents on the financial question that we who are called the greenback men and sometimes inflationists are not so wedded to a paper currency that we are not willing at any time to displace it with hard money when it can be done upon anything like equal terms and without detriment to the interests of the people. We are not so much absorbed in admiration of the much-abused "rag-baby" that we would not turn it into a "metal baby" whenever the state of our purse permitted. Indeed, sir, I have become weary of the distinctions of hard-money and soft-money men, especially among democrats. I imagine that in the abstract we are all hard-money men; and if we had to begin anew, if our Government was not overwhelmed in debt and our people not laboring under the effects of a paper currency system most unwisely inaugurated, if with a people free of debt and prosperous we had to establish a currency, we should all agree to make it in the accepted money of the world.

But a word or two on this bill. Under the operation of the act of January 14, 1875, called the resumption act, we are told that the Secretary of the Treasury has purchased silver to the amount of about $16,000,000, and that that money is now in the Treasury. We are also told, and I suppose on good authority, that the silver coins did not cost more and are not worth more than the paper currency, indeed not so much. It is said also that to keep up the amount of fractional currency to forty-five millions or about that sum from year to year by reprinting costs the Government about $2,000,000 annually; that the fractional paper currency wears out in ten or twelve months, whereas the silver will last from twenty-five to fifty years, and the coinage of the silver costs but little more than the original printing of the fractional paper. These statements being true, they prove that the Government will be saved the expense of printing or reprinting the paper currency sufficient to keep the required amount in circulation about two millions per annum as long as the paper currency should be retained. If it should be retained five years the cost would be ten millions, if ten years it would be twenty millions; all of which could be saved by the substitution of silver.

The transposition, therefore, of the paper for the silver would be a great saving for the Government, and would be a return to that extent to hard money. But some of our friends say that by doing this we should indorse, to a degree at least, the policy of the republican party. Well, sir, so far as I am concerned, that is no objection with me. I deem it our duty to support any measure for economy and the good of the country, especially upon this important subject, it matters not from what party it emanates; indeed, I am happy to see that the two parties in this House somewhat harmonize on this bill. I would not, however, give my support to the bill without the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, which is the safety-valve of the measure. That amendment prevents the Secretary of the Treasury from issuing any more interest-bearing bonds for the purchase of coin, and operates as a practical repeal of the resumption act of January, 1875. With this amendment, and for the reasons I have given, I shall vote for the bill. Let us give a little of the old-fashioned silver currency to the people, that they may see and feel it once more and hear the clink of it in their pockets.

The question being taken on Mr. REAGAN'S amendment, there were—ayes 59, noes 71.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] The amendment to the amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following to Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment:

Provided, That if silver bullion is not presented for coinage in sufficient quantity to meet the demand for the redemption of fractional currency the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the provisions of the act of January 14, 1875, purchase silver bullion for the purposes of coinage as provided in this act.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I send to the Clerk a modification of my amendment, changing the phraseology.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "act" in the fourth line insert the words "entitled 'An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments,' approved."

Strike out the word "of" before the word "January" in the fourth line;

Strike out the word "this" in the sixth line and insert the word "said;"

Strike out in the second line the words "to meet the demand."

Mr. RANDALL. Those changes are merely clerical.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the amendment, as modified, be read.

Mr. OLIVER. I submit that the modification of the gentleman from Missouri presents substantially new matter, making the proposition practically a new amendment.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. In answer to the gentleman from Iowa——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. OLIVER] comes too late.

Mr. RANDALL. The changes are merely in the phraseology.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following to Mr. HOLMAN'S amendment:

Provided, That if silver bullion is not presented for coinage in sufficient quantity for the redemption of fractional currency the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, purchase silver bullion for the purposes of coinage as provided in said act.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the object of this amendment is simply to provide for an emergency which may occur. If citizens should not send in their bullion in sufficient quantities to fill the vacuum which will be caused by the return of the fractional currency, there should be provided a method by which the amount of bullion necessary for coinage may be obtained. It is well understood by the House that the object of this bill is to avoid the necessity for making further appropriations for the engraving and printing of fractional currency. The silver coin and bullion ready for coinage now in possession of the Government amount, as I am informed, to between $17,000,000 and $18,000,000, about $13,000,000 or $14,000,000 less than the amount of fractional currency which may be sent in for redemption. With the present facilities for sending in fractional currency it may be only a very few months before all such currency in circulation, or nearly all, will be returned to the Treasury. If under the provisions of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] which I propose to amend the people should not bring in bullion in sufficient quantities, there may be a deficiency to the extent I have indicated in the silver coin necessary to fill the place of the fractional currency. The object of my amendment is to provide for a contingency of that kind. I do not think the bill should pass without this very necessary provision.

Some of my friends on the floor of this House have declared themselves opposed to this amendment on the ground that it involves an increase of the bonded debt. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that this fractional currency is practically an interest-bearing debt, because the expense of engraving and printing it, together with the loss and destruction which fall upon the people while using it, may fairly be estimated at about 10 per cent. of the amount issued; while, if any bonded debt should be created under this provision, the interest upon that debt will not exceed 4½ or 5 per cent. It must be borne in mind that, in addition to the enormous cost for engraving and printing the fractional currency, the people of the country are suffering to the extent of about $1,000,000 annually by the loss or destruction of this fractional currency; so that they are paying annually for the privilege of this fractional currency at least $2,400,000.

None of my friends can have a greater horror of the issue of any more bonds than I have, but I feel we would be justified in issuing eight or ten millions of bonds if it were necessary to make up in specie coinage the fractional currency now outstanding.

Mr. GLOVER. Let me ask my colleague a question.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GLOVER. I wish to ask whether, in connection with the cost of printing, the loss of fractional currency does not equal nearly the cost of printing?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Very nearly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I rise nominally to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, but really to state the effect of that amendment. If the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is to be adopted, then it is wise the House should add the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to it; and I will tell you why. We provide in the bill that $16,000,000 of coin shall go out. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana then comes in, if that amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] should be adopted, that the owners of silver bullion should be allowed to deposit it and receive coin therefor, the Government obtaining seigniorage. If in case citizens do not deposit silver bullion up to the limit fixed to fractional currency by law, which is $50,000,000, then the Secretary of the Treasury, for any margin which does not reach $50,000,000, could operate under the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. It does not go to that extent, but only to the extent of fractional currency presented for redemption. It goes to that extent and no further.

Mr. RANDALL. Its operation would be this: I will illustrate by a statement. There are $16,000,000. Suppose a citizen comes in and deposits what will coin $10,000,000 of silver. That would make in all $26,000,000. There still would be a margin, according to the gentleman's estimate, of about $4,000,000 to reach the amount necessary to cover the entire outstanding fractional currency. The Secretary of the Treasury therefore would have the right to secure silver coinage to that amount of $4,000,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the event of the adoption of the amendment would not the result be as follows: The Government would be the only purchaser to any large extent of silver bullion. The United States would be the great purchaser of silver bullion. Instead of the practice in our past history, would not the holders of bullion withhold coin for the purpose of driving a better bargain with the Government? Would not that be the result?

Mr. RANDALL. That is to say, if I have so much beef on hand, I am going to allow it to spoil, so as to get a higher market. That is about it. The producers must and will come in to sell their bullion, or have it exchanged into money, so they may realize some profit from it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will my colleague permit me to ask a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Not now. The advantage of the amendment is this: We secure the volume of silver coin in substitution of fractional currency without the sale or issue of any bonds. There seems to be a fear in that regard lurking in the minds of some gentlemen that such may happen. This will obviate anything so undesirable. In case of the failure to deposit, then the Government, under the operation of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, will be quite safe in reaching the point to issue $4,000,000 to complete the substitution of fractional currency by silver coin.

Mr. KELLEY. Permit me to put a single question, and I do it for the purpose of information. In the event of silver coin being exported, would there be any provision for supplying the place of that which was exported other than by the issue of new bonds?

Mr. RANDALL. Those matters are all regulated by the law of supply and demand, as the gentleman very well knows.

Mr. KELLEY. If you are going to limit it to a certain amount, then if there be——

Mr. RANDALL. For various reasons which I stated the other day, in my judgment, it is desirable to limit the aggregate issue of silver coin by law. The fractional currency is limited now.

Mr. KELLEY. But it is not exportable. It is not a commercial commodity as silver is. Thirty thousand dollars of silver coin was exported on the steamer Java yesterday, and if, in the present condition of silver, it can be exported, the whole $40,000,000 may before Congress assembles again go out of the country.

Mr. RANDALL. That only goes to establish the probability of a steady silver market.

Mr. KELLEY. If you coin that $40,000,000, and that be exported, what then will be your fractional currency?

Mr. RANDALL. It is regulated by the supply and demand.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, and Mr. KELLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 88, noes 88.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does not that reject the amendment?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. How does the Chair vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. COX in the chair.) The Chair would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. KELLEY. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 106, not voting 65; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Bell, Blair, Blount, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Caswell, Chittenden, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Cutler, Danford, Denison, Durand, Eames, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Hancock, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Walker, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Young—65.

So the amendment of Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, was agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. ELLIS. I am requested to announce that Mr. LORD, of New York, is absent by leave of the House on committee business.

Mr. RANDALL. My colleague, Mr. ROBBINS, is absent. I believe if he were here he would vote "ay."

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am requested to state that my colleague, Mr. HURD, is absent by leave of the House attending a committee meeting.

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. MACKEY, is confined to his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri was agreed to; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask for a division on that.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 127, noes 69.

So the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote adopting the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Indiana as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as section 3:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; but silver bullion shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be received by the several mints for fabrication into subsidiary coins, and paid for in such coins at a rate or price per ounce to be fixed from time to time, according to the market rate, by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the basis of the difference between the par value of such coin and the value of such bullion; and an addition not exceeding 1 per cent., in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be made to the purchasing price as an allowance for the transportation of the coin; and the excess of the par value of such coin over the value of the bullion so deposited, less the amount that shall be allowed for transportation as aforesaid, determined as above provided, shall be from time to time covered into the Treasury as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct: Provided, however, That such silver coins of the denominations aforesaid and the silver bullion now owned by the United States shall not exceed in par value the par value of the fractional currency now authorized by law: Provided, That if silver bullion is not presented for coinage in sufficient quantity for the redemption of fractional currency, the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, purchase silver bullion for the purposes of coinage as provided in said act.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a division of the question on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana. I ask that the question shall be put separately on the first four lines of the printed amendment preceding the word "but."

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not amendable. The gentleman wishes to strike out four lines of the amendment. He has no right to make such a motion.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for a division of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has no difficulty in deciding that an amendment reported from the Committee of the Whole as an entire amendment is not divisible.

Mr. HOLMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is very manifest that the effect of the pending amendment as amended presents but one feature of any special importance; and that is the subject of coinage of silver bullion by the Government for private parties. It will be seen that the first clause of this amendment which I had the honor to offer prohibiting the use of bonds in the purchase of coin, is virtually evaded by the last clause, which has been added on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri. It is certainly not a very ingenious feature in legislation to adopt a section, the first and most important clause of which is defeated in a great degree by the last. But such is the effect of this amendment as it now stands amended.

Still one provision remains, and that is that private parties may have their bullion converted into coin, the seigniorage or royalty going to the benefit of the Government. I think, sir, that that will be found to be under certain circumstances and in some contingencies a valuable feature. It may gradually furnish the country with subsidiary silver coin without loss to the Government, even if it is found that silver coin will leave the country under the laws of trade.

It is not probable that much bullion will go into the mints for coinage under this provision while the Government is either in the market or can be compelled to go into the market to purchase bullion; for the Government will pay a higher price and has paid a higher price, I think, for the bullion than private parties would have realized if they had gone to the mint and had their bullion converted into coin, the seigniorage going to the Treasury of the Government. So, sir, we can scarcely anticipate that, as by the act of the House in making this amendment the Government may and must in the contingency provided for go into the market and buy bullion, this provision, which was designed to save the Treasury, will have very great effect. It is scarcely to be hoped that any material amount of bullion will go into the mints for the purpose of coinage. And yet we take by this one step perhaps in the right direction, and that is going back to the former practice of the Government, not going into the market to purchase bullion, but putting its stamp of sovereignty and money value on bullion when presented at its mints and coined. That has been the practice of the Government during the larger portion of its existence. Indeed, that has been the law in the main until the passage of the resumption act of 1875, and is the law still as to gold coin and also as to the trade-dollar. The citizen deposits his bullion in the mint and the Government puts the stamp of money value upon it and it goes into circulation, the Government in the case of silver bullion being paid the expenses of coinage and coining the gold without charge. That has been our system in the main from the foundation of the Government. But I am uncertain myself whether any important result will be gained by this provision as it now stands. I had hoped that the House would repeal at least one of the most objectionable features of this oppressive resumption act, that feature that authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to issue and sell gold-interest-bearing bonds to buy silver bullion, under which the public debt has already been increased over ten millions. I had hoped at least that we could put an end to the policy of the Government going into the market with its interest-bearing bonds and purchasing bullion to be manufactured into coin when the same result could have been accomplished by the retirement, if that must take place, from time to time of the fractional paper currency and permitting citizens owning bullion to go in the mints and have it coined. Thus without expense to the Government the country would soon be supplied with silver coin, unless the laws of trade are against it. But, with the combination formed by the owners of the bullion to keep up the price in view of the Government becoming a purchaser, and perhaps under this law compelled to become a purchaser, it is manifest that the loss by the Government cannot be inconsiderable. And yet, if the amendment as amended be adopted by the House, it may restore the policy of the Government of coining the bullion of its citizens instead of becoming a purchaser in open market of bullion, the seigniorage of it going to the profit of the Government. My proposition was a measure of economy. I am not willing that the Government shall go on buying silver bullion and converting it into coin, adding million after million to the public debt, when no man can say whether it will remain in the country as currency or not even for a month. If it leaves the country it is a total loss to the Government and fractional paper currency would have to be issued.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Before the gentleman from Indiana takes his seat, I would ask him if he does not consider the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to go on and issue bonds for the redemption of fractional currency, as required by the resumption act—in other words, is it not a practical enforcement of the resumption act?

Mr. HOLMAN. Of course the gentleman from Kentucky understands that if the bullion-holders withhold their bullion from coinage and we make no provision for issuing fractional paper currency the Government will be required under this section to go into the market and buy bullion, and this provision may be construed to authorize the issue of bonds for that purpose. The bullion-holders will seize their advantage. That is the fatal feature of this provision as it now stands, and those of us who are willing of at least trying the experiment of substituting subsidiary silver coins for the fractional currency, which while not so cheap in the first instance is more stable, may be inclined to support the bill with the objectionable features in it, still it is embarrassing in the last degree to be compelled in order to accomplish that purpose to have to vote for a measure which may steadily increase the interest-bearing debt of the Government. Against the increase of that debt I solemnly protest.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] has very properly stated that the provision involved in the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is directly in conflict with the first four lines of the provision of his amendment. At the same time, it is proper to say that, whether the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is attached to the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana or not, the practical result of the amendment will be the same, because in the one case the Secretary of the Treasury is compelled in the event of bullion not coming in for coinage to go into the market and purchase it by the issue of interest-bearing bonds, and, in the other case, if private individuals come in and take silver subsidiary coin in exchange for bullion, the silver subsidiary coin will drive into the Treasury for redemption the fractional currency which is outstanding, according to the well-known "law of Gresham," that the inferior currency always drives out the superior.

I suppose there is no longer any question in the mind of any gentleman on this floor that during the whole of last year (as will probably be true for the time to come) silver subsidiary coin has been worth less in actual intrinsic value than the market value of the fractional currency which it is designed to replace. Therefore the fractional currency must go into the Treasury for redemption. Under the law the Secretary of the Treasury is bound to redeem it with legal-tender notes, and therefore legal-tender notes will be withdrawn from the Treasury, and they must be replaced in one of two ways: either by increasing the taxation on the people of the country or by the issue and sale of interest-bearing bonds. The result, therefore, is exactly the same, no matter whether the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is adopted or not. It comes to this: that the people of the country are either to be taxed for replacing the fractional paper currency or 5 per cent. bonds must be issued on which they are to pay interest until the principal is paid off by taxation; no matter what happens, the people pay and suffer.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it was just this proposition to issue any more interest-bearing bonds that I entered my protest against; because it is not the fractional currency which is in discredit or irredeemable in this country; it is the legal-tender notes; and if we issue any more 5 per cent. bonds, I want to hold every one of them sacred for the purpose of procuring not silver, but gold as our only hope of resuming specie payment.

To divert the proceeds of these bonds into the purchase of silver is therefore an entire waste of the resources of this country. This amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WELLS] is only a circumlocutory mode of enforcing the provision of the original resumption act, with this additional objection, that the Director of the Mint is compelled from day to day to fix the price of bullion according to the fluctuations of silver in the market. I have received from the Director of the Mint a note as to whether that is practicable or not, in which he says:

Mr. RANDALL. What is the date of that?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. March 24.

Mr. RANDALL. We have conferred with the Director of the Mint since that time.

Mr. HOLMAN. The Director of the Mint is satisfied with this provision.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no doubt the Director of the Mint is satisfied with it.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. In his reply he says:

To-morrow, or even during the day, either silver or greenbacks may fluctuate either 1 or 2 per cent. Our purchasing price would therefore have to be altered almost daily, and it would produce inextricable confusion with depositors and in mint accounts.

Therefore it is evident that this provision cannot be properly carried out by the officers of the Government.

I am opposed to the amendment therefore upon the same grounds that I oppose the bill reported by the committee, that it causes an increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States for an unnecessary purpose; that it is a piece of extravagance, because the interest to be paid on the purchases of silver largely exceeds the cost of maintaining the fractional currency in good condition; that the silver coin, if it be worth more than currency, will be hoarded or exported; if it be worth less, it will be a fraud; that it postpones the time when we can resume specie payments by diverting into a subsidiary channel a fund which might and should be devoted to the purchase of gold, which alone can give a true resumption; and, finally, because it transfers to the democratic majority, sent here by the people to correct the blunders of the republican party, the responsibility for these blunders, and brings us into contempt, as wasting on minor questions the strength which should be husbanded for the settlement of the main question before the world, the speedy removal of the reproach which tarnishes the American name so long as any of the national obligations and pledges are not redeemed. No "jingle of silver" will answer this purpose or deceive the country as to the true meaning of specie payments.

Mr. RANDALL. We are at this time confronted with this fact: The agreement of the House was that there should be debate on these amendments, one speech of five minutes for and one of five minutes against, but somehow these gentlemen have both spoken rather against the pending amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not speak against the amendment at all.

Mr. RANDALL. I wish to say, in justice to the Director of the Mint, that on yesterday he said that this bill could be executed.

Mr. EDEN. I object to further debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The debate upon the pending amendment is exhausted, and the question is upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as amended on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to move an amendment to the pending amendment. This bill has now reached a stage when there is but one amendment pending, and under the rules of the House an amendment to that amendment is in order. I have examined the agreement which was made in relation to the discussion upon this bill, and I find nothing in the order of the House that would prevent an amendment being offered which would be in order under the rules. My amendment is simply to present the proposition which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] desired to present; that is, to obtain a separate vote upon the proposition contained in the first four lines of the printed amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN.] I therefore move to amend the amendment by striking out all after the first word "that" down to and including the word "but" before "silver" in the fourth line. That will make no inconsistency between the first and the last part of this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman move to strike out the last four lines of the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS?] If the one is in order I think the other is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As long as the previous question is not operating on this bill an amendment can be moved. The Chair will rule that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] is in order. The Chair will not go further at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. I will then call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. Was it not understood when this bill was brought out of the Committee of the Whole that it should be reported to the House with the pending amendments, to be acted on?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has examined the RECORD and found no such understanding. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] gave notice that when the amendments were voted upon he would call the previous question on the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. In that event the House has certainly been laboring under a mistake. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will be permitted to introduce again his original proposition without modification.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] has the floor to move his amendment, after which the Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] who has charge of the bill, if he desires to be recognized.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House certainly has been deceived as to the effect of the order which was made in regard to this bill.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] by striking out the words "the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; but;" so that the amendment will read:

That silver bullion shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be received by the several mints for fabrication into subsidiary coins, and paid for in such coins at a rate or price per ounce to be fixed from time to time, according to the market rate, by the Director of the Mint, &c.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on the bill and amendments.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] inasmuch as there has been a misapprehension as to the amendable condition of this bill, shall be permitted to offer his amendment without modification, so that we may have a vote upon the original proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] yield for that purpose?

Mr. RANDALL. I will.

Mr. MORRISON. I object, unless I am permitted to offer a substitute for this whole bill.

Mr. RANDALL. I will hear the substitute read.

Mr. HOLMAN, I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] will be read for information only.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $163,000, to provide for engraving, printing, and other expenses of making and issuing United States notes.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to issue silver coins of the United States of the denomination of ten, twenty, twenty-five, and fifty cents, of standard value, in redemption of an equal amount of fractional currency, whether the same be now in the Treasury awaiting redemption, or wherever it may be presented for redemption; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, under regulations of the Treasury Department, provide for such redemption and issue by substitution at the regular subtreasuries and public depositories of the United States until the whole amount of fractional currency outstanding shall be redeemed.

SEC. 3. That so much of the third section of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, A. D. 1875, as provides that "on and after the 1st day of January, A. D. 1879, the Secretary of the Treasury shall redeem, in coin, the United States legal-tender notes then outstanding on their presentation for redemption;" and so much of said section 3 of said act as authorized the use of any surplus revenue or the issue, sale, or disposal of any bonds to provide for such redemption, is hereby repealed. And until they are at par with and convertible into gold coin, any holders of said United States notes depositing any sum not less than $50, or some multiple of $50, with the Treasurer of the United States, or either of the Assistant Treasurers, shall receive in exchange therefor duplicate certificates of deposit, one of which may be transmitted to the Secretary of the Treasury, who shall thereupon issue to the holder an equal amount of bonds of the United States, coupon or registered, as may by said holder be desired, bearing interest at the rate of 4 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually and redeemable at the pleasure of the United States after thirty years: Provided, That the bonds so to be issued or exchanged shall not exceed the sum of $1,000,000 in any month. And the United States notes so deposited and redeemed shall be retired and canceled.

SEC. 4. That to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to exchange and fund United States notes as hereinbefore provided, he is hereby authorized to issue bonds of the description authorized by the act entitled "An act to authorize the refunding of the national debt," approved July 14, 1870, bearing interest at 4 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 5. That so much of said section 3 of said act of January 14, 1875, as provides for the increase of national-bank note circulation without limit is hereby so amended that such increase shall be so limited that the aggregate amount of outstanding legal-tender notes and of bank-notes in circulation shall at no time exceed the aggregate amount of such legal-tender and national-bank notes now outstanding. And so much of said section 3 of said act of January 14, 1875, as provides for the redemption of legal-tender United States notes in excess only of $300,000,000, to the amount of 80 per cent. of the increased national-bank note circulation authorized by said section 3 of said act, is hereby so amended as to authorize the redemption of 80 per cent. of such increased circulation, less the amount of national-bank circulation surrendered.

SEC. 6. That during the existence of any national banking association, and until the resumption of payment in specie of its circulating notes, it shall annually set aside and retain, as a resumption fund, from the coin receivable as interest on the bonds deposited with the Treasurer of the United States as security for its circulation, an amount equal to 3 per cent. of its circulating notes issued to such association and not surrendered, and which resumption fund shall be counted and used as part of the lawful money reserve which said banking associations are, by existing laws, required to maintain.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. HOLMAN. That proposition has not been printed. I object to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was entitled to the floor and called the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] objects to this amendment. I now call the previous question upon the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.] If that is sustained and the amendment disposed of, then I shall be content to allow the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to come in, when I will call the previous question on that amendment and the bill.

Mr. MORRISON. Do I understand the gentleman to object to my offering this substitute?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have objected. Why, it is not even printed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] is entitled to the floor, and has called the previous question.

Mr. RANDALL. On the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. So the Chair understands. The amendment of the other gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is not before the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will allow me to have read what I propose as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Several members objected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in the first four lines of the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN the following: The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; but

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, which was upon the amendment of Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, to the amendment of Mr. HOLMAN.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to, there being—ayes 54, noes 115.

Mr. REAGAN. I now offer (to come in as the fourth section of the bill) my amendment without modification, as found on page 4 of the print.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] to offer that amendment, after which I demand the previous question on the amendment and bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I object to any other amendment, unless I am permitted to offer mine.

Mr. REAGAN. I have offered my amendment by leave of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already decided that, until the previous question is sustained, amendments are in order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is on the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

Mr. MORRISON. Will the Chair please tell me how my amendment was ruled out?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was never in; it was read for information only.

Mr. MORRISON. But I offered it.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was not germane, and was subject to the point of order that it made an appropriation of money.

Mr. MORRISON. But I offered it previous to the gentleman from Texas offering his amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. It was subject to a point of order anyhow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will settle this matter. The proposition of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] was read by the courtesy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who then moved the previous question on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD,] as he had the right to do. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, having the floor, now yields to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MORRISON. To offer an amendment after the previous question is ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question applied only to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. OLIVER. I rise to a point of order. It is that the gentleman from Pennsylvania cannot limit the operation of the previous question to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Texas offers the amendment which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 4 the following:
That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment. And silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

Mr. GARFIELD. I believe this amendment has been voted on already and voted down. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot undertake to say from a cursory reading of the amendment whether it has been voted on before or not.

Mr. FORT. The record will show that it has been.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will please state whether this is the same amendment that was voted on.

Mr. REAGAN. It is not the same. The amendment which was voted on had two clauses which this has not: one that silver should not be receivable for customs dues and the other that it should not be received in satisfaction of existing contracts payable in gold.

Mr. GARFIELD. This is the same as the printed amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls the previous question on the bill and pending amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The question recurred on Mr. REAGAN'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 135, noes 71.

Mr. KELLEY demanded the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore decided that by the count the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GARFIELD demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GARFIELD and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported 42, more than one-fifth of those present.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 94, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Banks, Banning, Bell, Blackburn, Blair, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Horatio C. Burchard, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Caulfield, John B. Townsend, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walls, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Young—71.

So the amendment was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, stated that his colleague, Mr. HURD, was absent from the Hall in attendance on the Committee on the Judiciary by leave of the House.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The hour has now arrived for taking a recess.

Mr. WHITE. What will be the business in order this evening?

The SPEAKER. Under the order made on Monday last under a suspension of the rules the session this evening will be for the consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] will occupy the chair.

The House then, at four and a half o'clock p. m., took a recess until seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House re-assembled at half past seven o'clock p. m., and was called to order by Mr. SPRINGER, as Speaker pro tempore.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WALKER, of New York, indefinitely on account of sickness; to Mr. BEEBE until Wednesday next on account of sickness; to Mr. SOUTHARD for one week on account of important business; to Mr. THOMAS two days on account of business; and to Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, for one week from to-morrow.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the legislative appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COX in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] to strike out in line 52, page 3, the words "during the session;" so that it will read: "Twenty-three messengers at $125 per month each."

Mr. O'NEILL. Before taking the question on this amendment, I think we had better wait until there is a quorum present. It is an important point in the bill. If necessary, I shall ask for a division.

Mr. RANDALL. The Senate committee have agreed to this part of the bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. The committee will bear in mind that the object of the amendment is to strike out the words "during the session," so these messengers will not be brought here for three months only and then discharged without pay during the recess.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not wish to debate it. The gentleman from Minnesota is not present, nor is there a quorum present, and I only ask the question may not be put at this time.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. For the purpose of giving opportunity for further explanation, I will move to strike out the last word. Some of the messengers are only paid during the session, while others are paid during the year. We have thirty-seven messengers in the House of Representatives, and the provision in this bill applies as well to messengers of the House as to the messengers of the Senate. Of the thirty-seven messengers of the House of Representatives, twelve are paid by the session and twenty-five by the year.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. You speak of the law as it exists now?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Yes, sir. Now there is no reason why some of these men should be paid the year through while others are paid only during a part of it. As I remarked last evening, the clerks of committees of this House, with three or four exceptions, are simply hired by the session, and when the session is over their pay comes to an end. This bill provides, as we are appropriating only for the short session, the three months' session, that these gentlemen shall receive pay for four months, being one month over the time their services are required.

I have here some figures showing the saving to the Government by the amendment proposed by the committee. It will be borne in mind that from the 1st of July next to the 1st of December, 1877, when the new Congress will be organized, there will be a period of seventeen months. The pay of messengers of the Senate during that time would be $106,760, under the present system of paying them the year through, or $77,760 per annum. The bill proposes to pay these messengers for four months for the short session, and the amount will be $27,500; thus making a saving of $50,260 for the year, or for the Forty-fourth Congress of $79,260.

Now, Mr. Chairman, this reduction does not in any way or form impair the efficiency of the service of this House. There is no reason that I believe any man can give why these gentlemen should be paid by the year any more than the pages who are daily waiting on you.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Missouri if these messengers are not all employed in the document and folding rooms during the recess of Congress?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Not one of them is required there.

Mr. PAGE. Have they not been so employed heretofore?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. No, sir. A few of them may have been, but not the messengers who are employed at the doors.

Mr. PAGE. I was informed to the contrary.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. The bill provides for a re-organization of the folding-room, which will work quite a radical change in the mode of folding documents and books.

Mr. PAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman if there is not more work in the folding-room during the recess, after Congress adjourns, than there is while Congress is in session?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I think not. During the recess there are no speeches and no CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS to fold, and there are many other duties which have to be performed during the session which have not to be performed during the recess. But I think as regards the consideration of this bill that it is immaterial whether they have more duties to perform there during the recess or not, because the bill provides a radical change in the organization of the folding-room.

Mr. DUNNELL. I perhaps said last night all I desired to say, and I do not know that I can add anything to what I then stated. I am clear in my conviction that there ought to be a better compensation provided for these messengers than is provided in the bill. I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. PRATT.]

Mr. PRATT. I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] will prevail. It seems to me that this provision in the bill for the compensation of these messengers is very ill-timed. There are many of the employés of the Senate, I am assured, who now receive a yearly salary who will fall within this classification of messengers, receiving under this bill but $125 per month during the session. This provision therefore affects those employés very materially; and my own opinion is that the effect will be to drive them out of the service of the Senate. Certainly no gentleman will suppose that men can come to the capital from a distant State to give services here for $125 a month during the session.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Do not the clerks of committees serve at $4 a day during the session now?

Mr. PRATT. Doubtless some of them do. But the gentleman very well knows that as regards the clerks very many of them have other employments. Very many come here and serve as clerks of committees who would not come but for the fact that they receive other compensation in other branches of service, as newspaper correspondents and the like.

The gentleman from Missouri remarked that we are only appropriating in this bill for the short session of three months. Very well. Suppose a gentleman from my own State comes here to take one of these positions. It will cost him $125 to come here and return to his home. There is one month's salary gone. It will cost him another month's salary to live while he is here. And he will go home with one month's salary in his pocket, if he is extremely economical and gets along at the lowest possible figure. Now I submit that gentlemen from distant States who are competent, who are reliable, who are men of character and capacity, and fit to be in the service either of the House or Senate, will not come here, and cannot afford to come here at this compensation. It seems to me that they should be accorded a yearly salary, one that will enable them to save money out of their salaries. Otherwise these positions will be filled from the army of office-seekers and hangers-on about the capital, whom members would like to know less of than they are obliged to do. And I think it ill becomes the dignity of the service, either of the Senate or of the House, to so compensate these employés that they should be obliged to be taken from the city of Washington and the District of Columbia, and that a system of compensation should be established which virtually prevents and prohibits men from distant States coming here and entering into the public service. For these reasons, Mr. Chairman, I hope that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I withdraw the formal amendment I offered.

Mr. HALE. I renew it. This list of Senate employés and their pay were fixed upon conference with the members of the Senate Committee on Appropriations. I do not mean to say that that committee of the Senate agreed in terms to all the reductions, in numbers especially, that have been put into this bill, but, generally speaking, the members of the Senate committee agreed that if a scale of reduction of the employés of the House was gone into they would submit to what the House submitted to for its employés. And the Committee on Appropriations of the House in presenting this bill have endeavored to put the two Houses on the same footing.

Now, as to this appropriation bill, I for one, as a member of the committee and as a member of the minority of the House, want to say that there are many good features in it, and in those features I for one expect to contribute to its passage as far as I am able.

I believe that the salaries of the employés of the two Houses belong to a class that may be fittingly reduced, as compared with the salaries in other branches of the service of the Government. The salaries here have been constantly on the increase in the two Houses. It has been natural that these gentlemen who hold office about here, in the Clerk's office, in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, under the Doorkeeper, and everywhere, being directly under our observation, being pleasant gentlemen, as they have been in the past, and as, I am glad to say, so far as I know, they are in the present, have appealed to our sympathies; and from time to time we have put their pay up, so that it bears no relation to the past to what the employés in the different Departments of the Government do. A messenger at one of these doors here receives $1,500 or $1,800 a year. He must be here; he is useful; he should be a gentleman, and he should be quick and accurate; but after all, when you take the service he performs during the twelve months into consideration, it is in no degree as onerous as the work performed by a clerk in other departments of the Government, who works from January to December inclusive, with but thirty days' vacation; and it is a long and weary round of service in other departments that promotes a man so that he obtains $1,600 or $1,800 a year.

While I do not believe—and I say it now, and notify my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations—in cutting down the salaries of the clerks in the Departments, (for I believe they perform their work and earn their money,) I believe that in both of these Houses of Congress, the Senate and the House, representing both political parties, there is an opportunity of reducing, in the interest of fair, economical administration of the Government, the salaries of their employés, and for that reason I believe the Committee on Appropriations should be sustained in most of the propositions appertaining to the Senate and the House. There are certain things in the bill which, when we reach them, will be corrected, and certain things which the Committee on Appropriations itself will seek to correct; but, generally speaking, I do not think we can put ourselves with good grace against the reductions recommended by the committee.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I desire to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] a question, and it is whether he does not consider the reduction as applied to the employés of the House and Senate rather more than that applied to the departmental clerks and employés of the Government? I will give an instance where our messenger now receives from $1,400 to $1,600 a year; under this bill he would receive only $500 a year, that is, four months' salary at $125 a month. I think that cuts down his salary about 75 per cent., and I ask if that is anything like the same ratio that is applied in this bill to any others of the employés of the Government?

Mr. HALE. For the work he does and the time he is employed the reduction is not greater than elsewhere.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the attention of the House to one or two facts in connection with this bill that seems to have escaped the attention of members. This bill proposes to commence payment on the 1st of July next. Now the fact is, that we have kept up the number and salaries of the employés of this House up to the 1st of July at the same rate as now, which everybody admits to be too high, and there is great force in what the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has just stated, that the past salaries of the clerks here bear a very unjust relation when compared to the compensation of the clerks in the Departments. For instance, take the case of a clerk in the Department of Mr. New, the Treasurer of the United States, an officer who handles millions of dollars a year and who receives a much less salary than the salary of the ordinary clerks of this House. We found that to be the case and we endeavored to make an equitable relation all around.

Let us examine a little further. We propose at this fixed rate to pay full salaries for seventeen months' service, that is to say, from the 1st day of July until December, or near there, when the employés are not here at all. Then we pay them for their actual service, running at the same rate, for the three months of the next session and one additional month, and then we absolutely pay them nine months further, until next December, when they are not here.

Mr. SPRINGER. By the present law?

Mr. RANDALL. No; by this law. Therefore we practically in fixing these salaries have fixed them at a rate per annum; and yet in seventeen months from July next they will have to perform but four months' service. Now, will anybody say that we have treated these clerks unjustly when, as stated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr HALE,] the fact is that the clerks in the Departments work eleven months out of every year?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Does the gentleman mean by "clerks" those employed by us here?

Mr. RANDALL. I mean the clerks to whom no monthly compensation is paid; those paid a yearly salary.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I believe the clerks at the desk here are not paid by the month.

Mr. RANDALL. Of course I refer to the clerks paid a yearly salary. We have been equitable and just, and endeavored to make the salary of these clerks compare with the salaries of the clerks in other Departments of the Government. We could do no more, and we could do no less. We have endeavored to act fairly with them all around.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE. I withdraw my formal amendment.

The question was then taken on the amendment of Mr. DUNNELL; and it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For hire of horses and mail-wagons for carrying the mails, $2,000; and the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate is hereby directed to advertise in one of the daily papers in Washington, District of Columbia, for one week for proposals for furnishing horses and wagons for carrying the mails, books, and other documents between the city post-office and the Departments and the Senate post-office and document-room; said proposals to include for the carrying of said mails, books, and documents the use of not more than three horses and wagons during the session of Congress, one of which shall be in use during the year; and he shall contract with the lowest responsible bidder for such service for the term of one year.

Mr. RANDALL. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I desire to move an amendment to the phraseology of the paragraph just read, not changing the amount of money appropriated but changing the phraseology, so as to make it read more nearly as we intended. My amendment is to make that portion of the paragraph read:

For carrying the mails, books, boxes, and other documents between the city post-office and the Departments and residences of members and the Senate post-office and folding-room and document-room; said proposals to include, for the carrying of said mails, books, boxes, and documents, the use of three horses and wagons during the session of Congress, one of which shall be in use during the year.

This modification is to provide for the taking of the mails to the residences of Senators.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For expenses of compiling and preparing the Congressional Directory, to be expended under the direction of the Joint Committee on Public Printing, $1,200.

Mr. RANDALL. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I move to amend by inserting, after the paragraph just read, the following as an additional paragraph:

For cartage, $700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

Capitol police:

For one superintendent, $1,600; two assistant superintendents, at $1,200 each; twenty-one privates, at $1,000 each; and four watchmen, at $900 each; in all $28,600, one-half to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate and the other half to be paid into the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend the clause relating to the pay of the privates by striking out "$1,000" and inserting "$1,200." I desire to call the attention of this committee to the very large reduction that is made by this bill in the pay of the privates in the Capitol police force. Last year, and up to the present time, the pay of those privates has been $1,400 a year. By this bill it is proposed to reduce their pay to $1,000 a year each. With all due respect to the Committee on Appropriations, I insist that this reduction is altogether out of character. It is too large a reduction.

As members very well know, many of these police, most of them, are men of families; all of them come from different and distant parts of the country; most of them are soldiers who have been in the service. Now, to cut their pay down from $1,400 to $1,000 is altogether a greater reduction than is made almost anywhere else in this entire bill. We cut down our own pay 10 per cent., and we propose to cut down the pay of these policemen nearly 40 per cent. Many of these men will find themselves utterly unable to remain here upon that pay. They are to be here all the year; most of them have families, and they must pay house-rent; they are educating their children, sending them to the public schools, and they have some character at home and desire to preserve some character here.

I do not propose to occupy a great deal of time while this bill is being considered, as I am not wont to do. But when I discover a provision of this kind I cannot let it pass without moving an amendment to it. To cut down the pay of these privates at one swoop from $1,400 to $1,000, nearly every one of whom has been a soldier and has a family to support and children to educate, I respectfully submit is altogether too large a reduction. I hope the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations and this Committee of the Whole will yield to a sense of justice and consent to my amendment.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DUNNELL. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman says that this cut-down is very large. Does the gentleman honestly believe that $1,000 a year for a policeman is not ample pay for his services? Does he not know that in all of our cities you cannot find a night watchman who receives over $800 or $900 a year? Why, then, should a policeman here in this Capitol building, standing below here on a marble floor, receive more than our cities pay their policemen? I do not mean that the pay has not been cut down largely; it has been. The only question I ask of the gentleman is, does he honestly believe that $1,000 a year will not pay a policeman, and that for that amount we cannot hire just as many as can stand between here and Washington monument?

Mr. DUNNELL. In reply to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] I will admit that a large number of men might be found to come here as policemen for $1,000 a year. So there are men who will take our places for $1,000 a year. That is no argument at all. The policemen in this city are paid $1,800 a year.

Mr. FRYE. Then they get $800 too much, and it is an outrage on the tax-payers.

Mr. DUNNELL. Well, I insist that this is below the average compensation of policemen throughout the country. I do not know how it may be in the diminutive city in which the gentleman from Maine resides; but in the larger cities of the country, where police service is called for all the time, $1,000 a year is not a sufficient compensation.

One word more and I shall take my seat. Every man upon this police, with hardly an exception, has a wife and children. Now a reasonably suitable house cannot be rented for less than $25 a month.

Mr. FRYE. How does the gentleman know that they have wives?

Mr. DUNNELL. They ought to have; I presume they have. I know very many of these men; and they are worthy of a better compensation than that proposed in this bill. Eighty dollars a month is a compensation altogether too small. I will admit that men might be found to take their places at less pay; but that is not the question. When we employ men, let us pay them properly.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] has asked why we made this change. I will say that this Capitol police is somewhat of an ornament. By comparison with the watchmen in this same paragraph, whose pay is fixed at $900, $1,400 is altogether too high compensation for these policemen. The men on this Capitol police are never exposed to the inclemency of the weather, as are the watchmen, who according to this bill are to receive but $900. The latter officers, according to my judgment, are entitled to more pay than the Capitol police who walk around inside this building.

Anybody who has been accustomed to be here (as I have during this session) very often at night must know that the position of these Capitol police is a very comfortable place. These men occupy their time generally in reading or in sauntering about. In point of exposure of health or hazard of life their duty bears no comparison with that of the ordinary police in our cities. So far as I can learn the pay of the latter, who buffet storms and encounter ruffians in all the cities of this Union, is not above $1,000 a year. We thought, therefore, that here was a proper place to equalize the pay.

Mr. FOSTER. If the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] will withdraw his motion, I will offer a substitute for the whole paragraph.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. FOSTER. I offer the following as a substitute for the paragraph:

Capitol police:

For one captain, $1,800; three lieutenants at $1,400 each; twenty-one privates at $1,200 each; and eight watchmen at $1,000 each; in all, $39,200; one-half to be paid into the contingent fund of the Senate, and the other half to be paid into the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. Chairman, in connection with another member of the Committee on Appropriations I gave this subject some attention. I find that the present force is thirty-one, composed of one captain, three lieutenants, and twenty-seven privates. The force provided for by the bill as reported is twenty-four. The force proposed by this amendment is twenty-five, the difference being simply one lieutenant. The amendment retains the organization just as it is now, and reduces the privates by six. It increases the watchmen from four to eight. I believe that this is a proper force of Capitol police and watchmen. I think it is as little as we can comfortably do with.

As to the pay, the captain heretofore has received $2,000. The bill reduces that to $1,600—a reduction of 20 per cent. The amendment proposes to fix the pay at $1,800—a reduction of 10 per cent. By the bill the lieutenants are reduced from $1,600 to $1,200. The amendment proposes that they shall be paid $1,400. The privates are now paid $1,400. The bill provides that their pay shall be $1,000; the amendment $1,200—a reduction of $200.

Mr. RANDALL. Does not the gentleman think that the superintendent of police, receiving $1,600, is as fairly compensated as a third-class clerk in one of the Departments?

Mr. FOSTER. I do; still I think he is just as valuable as an assistant messenger under the Doorkeeper of this House or some others of the employés of the House.

As has been said, these gentlemen have all been Union soldiers. They have the care of millions of dollars' worth of property. We make a very large reduction in their pay—too large, I believe—larger than in the compensation of our messengers. We give the latter $1,400 a year. Certainly a private in the police force is worth as much pay as a messenger in this House. The public property in this Capitol is under the charge of these policemen; the grounds adjacent are under their care. I believe that the reduction proposed by my amendment is about fair, measured by the reduction proposed in other forces about this House.

Mr. FORT. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, has stated to the House, as one reason why these officers should have the pay proposed in his amendment, that they have been Union soldiers. That, to my mind, is a good recommendation. If I know myself I will never be found detracting anything from that to which they are entitled. But it ought to be remembered by that same gentleman there are a good many hundred thousand Union soldiers who are not employed as Capitol police, and who cannot be employed as Capitol police, but who are just as worthy as those who are so employed, and who to-day are laboring as the great mass of the people of the country are laboring, and find it hard to obtain a living and support for themselves and families. We cannot adopt the principle, no matter how much we may care for the soldier, to employ him because he is a soldier and to pay him more than his services are worth, all other things considered. That principle is not applied in any of the Departments when we come to employ a clerk. It is a principle, as I understand, nowhere applied to any employés. While it is a good reason for retaining those now in office and for treating them with favor, it is no reason why they should be paid more than their services are worth.

I think with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that it is not just to pay these men more than their services are worth, although, as I have said, I am willing to retain those who occupy the positions at present. For, sir, there are many upon this floor who have seen the day they would be willing to work not only for this pay but for half of it. The country to-day is full of people who are laboring to support their families and who bear the burden necessary to raise the revenue for the support of the Government who would be willing to do this service at one-half the sum now paid.

It is said these men have responsible duties to perform. I cannot see they have any special responsibility. To be sure it is stated they have a vast amount of property under their charge. They watch this Capitol, but we all know it is composed mostly of incombustible material. It can neither be burned down nor stolen, and I do not see any duty they can perform unless it be to preserve the peace and good order in and about this Capitol. For that purpose I suppose a few policemen are necessary, but, in my judgment, it is not such a responsible place as that of policemen outside of the Capitol, who, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has well said, hazard life and limb in preserving the peace against desperadoes of the streets and who are exposed to the inclemency of the weather. I believe the amendment ought not to be agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER's amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move an amendment, to strike out the word "superintendent" in line 116, and in line 117 the words "two assistant superintendents," and in lieu thereof to insert the words "captain and lieutenant."

I do this, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that they have been known for many years in the law by that name. If we change the title, I think it will have the effect to legislate out of office the persons who hold these positions. I am certain the chairman would not desire to do any such thing. I think it better therefore to retain the old designation. I hope the gentleman will consent to this amendment, for I am sure he would not indirectly attempt to legislate out of office the persons who now hold them.

Mr. RANDALL. Major Richards is called superintendent of the police.

Mr. GARFIELD. These have always been known as captain and lieutenant of the police. For many years it has been their designation. They were appointed by that name, and by that name they have held the office for many years; and I think, if we pass the bill as it is, it will have the effect of abolishing the present officers.

Mr. RANDALL. We wish to give them civil rank.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is it the gentleman's purpose to legislate them out of office?

Mr. RANDALL. By no means.

Mr. GARFIELD. You do it by this language.

Mr. HALE. I hope the chairman of the committee will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio. The main features of the bill are being sustained by the House.

Mr. GARFIELD. My amendment does not affect the salary or the number.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not object to it.

Mr. GARFIELD's amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For compensation of members of the House of Representatives and Delegates from Territories, $1,359,000; and from and after the 30th of June next the compensation of said members and Delegates shall be $4,500 per annum.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I beg leave to offer an amendment to come in at the end of that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no member of either House of Congress elected to fill a vacancy shall hereafter be paid for any time prior to the day of his election.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Mr. Chairman, that amendment is in precise terms with the one I had the honor to offer last night, and which was adopted by a vote of 115 to 30. Unfortunately, and unconsciously to most of the gentlemen who voted for it, the amendment was lost with the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio to abolish mileage altogether.

I propose now, sir, to see if this amendment will stand upon its merits or whether it shall be killed by a square blow. I have no personal interest in it whatever. I made no reflections last night and I make none to-night upon those gentlemen who in the past have received pay under the law as it stands; but I know there are several members of this Congress who have refused to receive it.

And I think, Mr. Chairman, that a law of so doubtful ethics is a fair subject of consideration in these times, when every clerk and every messenger and every policeman is subject to reduction of his pay.

Now, sir, I say in all kindness and without any intention of disrespect that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY,] in shouting "meanness," does not answer my proposition. Neither does his elegant alphabetical combination, which is not, in my dictionary nor in any other dictionary within my reach, and the meaning of which I do not pretend to understand—neither is his "bah" any answer to the question whether a member of Congress shall receive pay for six months before his election.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to say that I never objected to his proposition. Indeed, I hardly knew that he had made one.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I am very glad to know that. I read the gentleman's remarks this morning, and I listened to them last evening without the least feeling. But there were several indications in his manner and several in his looks, and there are several in the types, that seemed to me to indicate that he meant me. [Laughter.] But I will say here as to the gentleman's remarks, that I took them, as I take a good deal that he says about the non-exportable currency, as of no account whatever. [Laughter.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I mean to be serious.

Mr. KELLEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me to ask his pardon for having said anything he could have supposed to have applied to him.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. It is not necessary. It is all right.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment explains itself, and I shall not detain the House another moment in dicussing it. I have no interest in it which is not common to every member of the House. But I believe that the people require us to look out for some of the errors and looseness that have crept into the legislation of Congress in respect to the pay of its own members during the last fifteen years of demoralization.

Mr. RANDALL. Last night the committee by a very decided vote determined to incorporate with the paragraph relating to Senators' pay what is now moved by the gentleman from New York. I believe the language is exactly the same. Is it not?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Precisely the same.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to it here so far as I am concerned. But it would be a repetition, it seems to me, to have it twice incorporated in the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. The chairman of the committee will understand that the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CHITTENDEN] last evening was an amendment to the amendment which I offered, and it fell with mine.

Mr. RANDALL. I am obliged to the gentleman for that explanation.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. It was lost with the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and is not in the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The committee decided by a very large vote last night to incorporate that amendment in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. I therefore do not feel that, as chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I can resist it now.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. Is an amendment to the amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I offer the following amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN:]

Add to the amendment as follows:

And provided further, That the compensation which would have been due to a deceased member had he lived shall be paid to the family of said deceased member up to the date of the election of his successor.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest to the gentleman that he modify his amendment by providing that the payment shall be made to the widow, and in case there is no widow, to the legal representatives.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I am willing to modify it in that way.

As I understand it, as the law is now, where a member is elected and dies, for instance in thirty days after he is elected, his family or heirs draw no pay. His successor, elected a year afterward, draws the pay which would have been due the member had he lived. This amendment is to secure to the widow or lawful heirs of the deceased member the compensation which he would have drawn had he lived. It is certainly unjust that the member who is not elected until one year after the legal time of the election of members should draw the pay which was due to the member elected at that time.

Mr. CHITTENDEN. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania allow me to state that there is nothing about death in my amendment. It covers cases of resignations as well as cases of death. If the gentleman modifies his amendment to make it harmonize with mine in that respect, I see no objection to it.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I would ask the gentleman if he has ever known a case where a member drawing $5,000 and doing nothing has resigned?

Mr. CHITTENDEN. I have known a case where a member was elected to fill a vacancy caused by resignation. I have known several such cases.

Mr. RANDALL. I would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHEAKLEY] whether the result of his amendment is to give to the widow or legal heirs of the member deceased the amount of pay up to the time of the election of his successor?

Mr. SHEAKLEY. That is the intention.

Mr. RANDALL. I have always thought that that was just; and while not authorized to accept the amendment, I hope the committee will adopt it.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. With the permission of the committee I will modify the amendment by inserting the words "widow or legal representatives."

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to oppose the amendment pro forma, merely for the purpose of making a suggestion. It has been the usual practice of this House, I believe, when a member has died and the widow or heirs are in circumstances requiring it, that the House have granted pay even beyond the time of the member's death. Now, would it not be better to continue that discretion in the House? If you give it to the heirs, then the widow would not get it, as she would only get one-half of the personalty; whereas this House might determine that the widow should get it. It ought to be left to the discretion of this House to give the whole of it to the widow in certain contingencies, and therefore I think that probably by passing such a law as this we would place the widows and families of deceased members in a worse position than they are at present.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for the reading of the amendment to the amendment as modified.

The Clerk read as follows:

And provided further, That the compensation which would have been due to a deceased member had he lived shall be paid to the widow, or, if no widow, the legal heirs of said member up to the date of election of his successor, and this shall apply to cases of resignation as well.

Mr. RANDALL. That part of the amendment about resignation ought to be stricken out; a man might resign and not leave a widow.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can only take notice of amendments as they are sent to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not reflecting on the Chair at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. KASSON. Let us vote down this amendment, and then the gentleman can offer one in a correct form; this is evidently not correct.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask my colleague from Pennsylvania to strike out that part of his amendment which relates to resignation.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I will so modify the amendment.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. SHEAKLEY to the amendment of Mr. CHITTENDEN; and it was agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I move to strike out the last word of the amendment as amended. It seems to me that it would be well to examine the statute proposed to be amended. As the law now stands the widow of a deceased member who dies after his term of office shall have commenced can draw three months' pay; and I will ask the Clerk to read sections 49, 50, and 51 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read section 49, as follows:

SEC. 49. When any person who has been elected a member of or Delegate in Congress dies after the commencement of the Congress to which he has been elected, his salary shall be computed and paid to his widow; if no widow survive him, to his heirs at law, for the period that has elapsed from the commencement of such Congress, or from the last payment received by him to the time of his death, at the rate of $7,500 a year, with any traveling expenses remaining due for actually going to or returning from any session of Congress.

Mr. FORT. It will be noticed that Congress has since reduced the amount of pay from $7,500 to $5,000.

The Clerk then read the fiftieth and fifty-first sections of the Revised Statutes, as follows:

SEC. 50. Salaries allowed under the preceding section shall be computed and paid in all cases for a period of not less than three months from the commencement of Congress.

SEC. 51. Whenever a vacancy occurs in either House of Congress by death or otherwise, of any member or Delegate elected or appointed thereto after the commencement of Congress to which he has been elected or appointed, the person elected or appointed to fill it shall be compensated and paid from the time that the compensation of his predecessor ceased.

Mr. FORT. It will be seen that these are the three sections of the Statutes at Large which are proposed to be amended. The law at present is that if a member dies after the session begins or after his term commences his widow or heirs shall draw the three months' pay, even if he dies the next day after his term begins. But if you adopt the amendment as proposed it may turn out that the widow would not draw three months' pay because the successor of her husband might be elected and be entitled to his pay within a less period than three months after the death of her husband; so the amendment, as I understand it, is really in the direction of reducing the pay allowed to the widows and heirs of deceased members.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. There is no injustice in that, because the member had drawn a year's pay, or, at least, pay from the 4th of March, when his term commenced.

Mr. FORT. Take the instance of a man who dies on the 5th of March. In that case the widow would draw three months' pay, and the successor might be elected within a month, and take his seat and draw pay from that time; and then, if this amendment is adopted that is now proposed, the widow would get pay only from the time of the death of her husband up to the time the new member was elected; so that if the House desires to be liberal to the widows and heirs of members it may turn out that the law, as it now exists, is more liberal than it would be if amended as proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SHEAKLEY.]

Mr. SHEAKLEY. Is there any justice in a member who is elected a year after the regular election drawing his whole salary?

Mr. FORT. That question has been settled by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHITTENDEN.]

Mr. SHEAKLEY. That does not go back.

Mr. FORT. I have no objection to the adoption of the amendment providing that the pay of members shall begin only from and after the time of their election. What I propose is to retain the statute as it now is in regard to the families of deceased members.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. FORT. Allow me to add, Mr. Chairman, that in the case of the vacancy now existing in Connecticut in the district formerly represented by Mr. Starkweather the election for his successor takes place next Monday, and in that case this amendment would give to the widow of Mr. Starkweather less pay than she would draw under the statute as it now is.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. CHITTENDEN as amended by the amendment of Mr. SHEAKLEY; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

In line 127 strike out all after the words "$9,000," as follows: "And from and after the 30th of June next, the compensation of said members and Delegates shall be $4,500 per annum," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And from and after June 30 next, the compensation of said members and Delegates shall be the actual mileage expended in coming and returning from each session or called session of Congress: Provided, That no money for mileage shall be paid to any member of Congress who received during the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses the extra compensation in excess of $5,000, until such member shall have refunded to the Government the amount in excess of the $5,000 received by him while a member of the Forty-second or Forty-third Congresses."

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. As a spirit of retrenchment is abroad in the land and we are all seeking how we may be able to reduce the expenditures of the Government, I have therefore introduced this amendment, in order to show how we may be magnanimous and at the same time reduce expenses. This being the centennial year, we can set an example by adopting this amendment, and thus reduce the expenditures of the Government at one blow over $1,365,000. It strikes me that no better example could be set by us as members of this body than to place ourselves before the country as at least ready to surrender some of the emoluments we receive. By this we may then, perhaps, be justified in reducing the compensation of clerks and employés in the different Departments as proposed by this bill.

Mr. STONE. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Certainly.

Mr. STONE. The amendment of the gentleman looks to the return of some of the money that has been received in former Congresses. Was the gentleman a member of the Forty-second and Forty-third Congresses?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I was not.

Mr. STONE. And as he received no money then, he would have none to return?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. If I had been a member of either of those Congresses, I would comply with this amendment, if it shall be adopted, by refunding.

I believe this House is animated by the feeling of retrenchment and reform which prevades the whole air. It is suggested by a friend near me that that is what makes the air here so bad. I am not certain about that, but perhaps that may be the cause of the bad air. As this is the centennial year, let us commence here among ourselves; let it go to the people that we adopt as a basis for our own pay that which will stagger those who come after us, and let this question be settled forever.

The amendment of Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi, was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

For compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the House of Representatives, namely: Clerk of the House of Representatives, $4,500, and for hire of horse and carriage for the use of the Clerk, $500; Chief Clerk, journal clerk, two reading clerks, and tally clerk, five in all, at $2,250 each; for disbursing clerk, file clerk, printing and bill clerk, and enrolling clerk, four in all, at $2,000 each; for assistant to Chief Clerk, assistant to enrolling clerk, resolution, petition, and distributing clerk, newspaper clerk, superintendent of document-room, index clerk, librarian, and engineer, eight in all, at $1,800 each; for stationery clerk, $1,500; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; two messengers assisting librarian, at $1,440 each; for book-keeper, two clerks, two folders, and two assistant engineers, seven in all, $1,200 each; for four firemen, at $900 each; one laborer at $820, and three laborers, at $720 each; one telegraph messenger and one page, at $2.50 per day each during the session; and one telegraph operator, at $100 per month during the session; for clerk to the Committee of Ways and Means, $2,250; messenger to the Committee of Ways and Means, $1,200; clerk to the Committee on Appropriations, $2,400; messenger to the Committee on Appropriations, $1,200; clerk to the Committee of Claims, $2,000; clerk to the Committee on War Claims, $2,000; clerk to Speaker's table, $1,500; private secretary to the Speaker, $1,500; Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives, $4,000; for one horse and wagon for his use, $500; clerk to the Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; paying teller for the Sergeant-at-Arms, $2,000; messenger to the Sergeant-at-Arms, $1,200; Doorkeeper, $2,500; chief messenger, $1,800; clerk for Doorkeeper, $1,200; Postmaster, $2,000; first assistant postmaster, $1,800; twelve messengers during the session, at $125 per month each and two at $1,200 each; Chaplain of the House, $900; five official reporters of the proceedings and debates of the House, at $4,500 each; two stenographers for committees, $4,500 each; and this shall be in lieu of all other compensation for such services in reporting and transcribing the proceedings of each and all of said committees; superintendent of the folding-room, $1,800; two clerks in the folding-room, one at $1,500 and one at $1,200; one folder in the sealing-room, $1,200; superintendent and chief assistant in the document-room, at $1,800 each; document file clerk, $1,200; thirty-two messengers, to be employed during the session, at $125 per month, $500 each, fourteen of whom shall be on the soldiers' roll; two folders, at $60 per month, during the session, $240 each; ten laborers, at $720 each; ten laborers, during the session, at the rate of $720 each per annum, $2,400; one laborer, at $600; one laborer, (Henry Douglas,) at $840; and for one female attendant in ladies' retiring-room, $600; making in all, the sum of $173,120.

Mr. RANDALL. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I desire to move sundry amendments to the paragraph just read. The first amendment is in line 148, after the words "for book-keeper," strike out the words "two clerks, two folders," and insert in lieu thereof the words "four clerks."

Mr. SAYLER. I would like to hear some explanation of that amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. If the gentleman will wait till I get through with my amendments to this paragraph he will then see exactly how it will stand. I think quite a number of the amendments the gentleman desires to offer have been provided for by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. SAYLER. I hope so.

The amendment of Mr. RANDALL was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to further amend, in line 152, by striking out "one telegraph messenger and," also in line 153 strike out the word "each;" so that it will read, "one page at $2.50 per day during the session."

Mr. GARFIELD. Why?

Mr. RANDALL. We want but one page, not a telegraph messenger also.

Mr. GARFIELD. Why not strike out the word "page," and leave "telegraph messenger," which is the major characteristic of the office?

Mr. RANDALL. He is in fact a page.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to further amend, in line 156, by striking out "$2,200" and inserting "$2,400," as the salary of the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means, so as to make his salary the same as that of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HALE. That is right; the salary of the two clerks has always been the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to further amend in the portion of the paragraph relating to the Doorkeeper, by striking out of lines 171 and 172 the words "chief messenger, $1,800," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "assistant doorkeeper, $2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to further amend in lines 195, 196, and 197, by striking out "two folders, at $60 per month during the session, $240 each; ten laborers, at $720 each," and inserting in lieu the words "four laborers under the superintendent of the folding-room, to handle books, at $720 per annum each; seven laborers, at $720 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I have an amendment changing the total amount appropriated by this paragraph, but I will not offer it at present.

Mr. SAYLER. I am disappointed in the amendments moved by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, for they do not reach my case. I move to amend by inserting after "dollars" in line 162 the following:

Clerk to the Committee on Public Lands, $2,000.

In their wisdom the Committee on Appropriations in this bill have seen fit to deprive the Committee on Public Lands of a permanent clerk. That committee has had a permanent clerk since 1862. As it is a matter of considerable importance, not only to that committee but to every member of this House, and I think to the people of this country generally, that this clerk should be retained, I desire to call attention to the manner in which this permanent clerk was first provided for and to the duties which are imposed upon him. It was in the second session of the Thirty-seventh Congress that the following resolution was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be authorized to employ a clerk for said committee, who shall, in addition to his usual duties, be charged with the care, preservation, and continuation of the series of land maps ordered for the use of said committee by the resolution of the House of Representatives of May 4, 1848, at the same compensation heretofore allowed the draughtsman upon the said maps.

Resolved, That the Speaker of this House be directed to assign a suitable room in the Capitol for the use of the said clerk, to be called the "land-map room," in which all the maps constructed under the said resolution shall be arranged and preserved for the use of the House of Representatives.

Under that resolution there was transferred from the Department of the Interior a skilled draughtsman who held the place for perhaps about one year, when another skilled draughtsman was transferred from that Department; and he has held the position from that day until this. That draughtsman has originated and now continues the series of land maps which mark out the public lands of the United States, giving their division into sections and showing definitely all the lands that have been granted for any purpose whatever. He has from that day to this never had a room assigned him in the Capitol, but has used for this purpose a room in his own house. He is to-day engaged in the construction of perhaps the greatest map that was ever made of any country, a map which is to be known as the "centennial map" and in reference to which I hold in my hand a letter from the Commissioner of the Land Office, asking specially that it shall be photo-lithographed for general use.

Sir, it is impossible for the Committee on Public Lands, charged with the grave interests which are committed to their care, to discharge intelligently their duties unless they have as clerk a skilled man who from day to day if necessary, certainly from week to week and from month to month, shall mark upon the original map hanging in the committee-room the precise condition of the public lands.

The Committee on Appropriations propose to appropriate $2,400 for a permanent clerk for themselves; a gentleman whose chief duty seems to be during the few minutes that Congress sits to multiply a given sum by ten and then subtract what is thus obtained (after the two decimal figures have been cut off) from the main sum; and who has nothing else to do the entire year. [Laughter.] They have seen fit to give to the Ways and Means Committee a clerk at $2,400, whose duties are more important I concede, and who ought to be a thoroughly intelligent gentleman. They have given to the Committee on Claims and the Committee on War Claims each a permanent clerk. But they propose that we shall employ a clerk at $4 a day, though our clerk is required by law to be a draughtsman and surveyor—a skilled man; for nobody else can possibly discharge the duties of the position, as every gentleman who has ever served upon the committee will say. In support of my proposition, I appeal to my friend on the republican side of the House, [Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania,] who was chairman of that committee last year.

As to the proposition that we shall employ a clerk at $4 a day, we simply cannot do it. Why, sir, there are a thousand million acres of unsurveyed lands in this country. Two hundred million acres have been given in one way or another to various corporations. From day to day we are watching the disposition of these lands; from day to day we are trying to recover them for the use of the settlers by preemption and homestead; from day to day, with the skillful assistance of our clerk, we are required to make marks upon the maps, that we may know how and with reference to what we are legislating. In all honesty and all earnestness, not simply as the chairman of the committee, but as a man who seeks to do his duty toward the people of the country who have a large interest in this land, I hope the amendment which I propose will not be antagonized.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no hostility whatever to the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] and I am quite willing that the House upon his statement should decide the question. The committee did not provide for this clerk as a permanent clerk, because, I presume, from all the information we could gather, it was not considered necessary. But I am quite willing that the House shall determine as between the committee and the gentleman who makes this statement, who, being the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands, is of course better informed on this subject than the Committee on Appropriations.

But I want to correct some of the gentleman's statements as to the character of the service performed by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations. There is no member of Congress who performs more valuable service to the country than this committee-clerk. I want this statement to stand side by side with that of the clerical mathematical duty which the gentleman from Ohio assigned to this clerk.

Mr. SAYLER. As the gentleman so kindly refrains from opposing my amendment, I retract what I said on that point.

Mr. KASSON. Is not this clerk provided for by the Revised Statutes as a permanent clerk?

Mr. RANDALL. He is.

Mr. KASSON. So that, if we adopt the amendment, we only put back this clerk to the position assigned him by the statutes.

Mr. RANDALL. We put him back to where he now is by law.

Mr. KASSON. I think that ought to be done.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, let the House so say, if it chooses.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I can very well appreciate the desire of the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands to retain the services of a valuable clerk to his committee. Having had the honor to serve on that committee for six years and to be its chairman for two years, I can very well testify to the valuable services that have been rendered to that committee by the present incumbent of the office of clerk. And I desire to say that the legislation with regard to the public lands is the most important that comes before Congress. It is, in addition to that, the most difficult and the most intricate legislation, and requires a large amount of care and sagacity on the part of the committee and of the clerk to steer clear of the snags and sawyers and quicksands found in the bills which are brought before Congress.

There are many bills with regard to the public lands coming before this House which, if they are not carefully watched, will rob the Government of millions of acres for the benefit of speculators. And to the care and vigilance of that clerk, who is familiar with the legislation of Congress for the last dozen years, the Committee on Public Lands on various occasions has been indebted for being saved from most unfortunate legislation. He is well posted in the legislation of the country and has been able to point out defects and deficiencies in bills, and to show when the tendency of particular measures is alone to benefit speculators to the great disadvantage of the country.

The present Committee on Public Lands, with a single exception, is an entirely new committee. The important duties imposed upon it are new to them. The legislation is mostly new legislation; and if they were left alone, without the vigilance of some one who has paid much attention to the land legislation of the country, this House might be led into measures which would be exceedingly unfortunate.

I desire to give it as my opinion it is a matter of economy, not the mere economy of the difference in the wages of the clerk, but a matter of vast economy in the care and protection of the public lands which will be afforded to the committee by the legislative experience and knowledge of the well-trained clerk they now have. I therefore trust the House will have no hesitation in acceding to the amendment of the distinguished chairman of that important committee.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to oppose the amendment. I do so, Mr. Chairman, merely for the purpose of making a suggestion in view of what we are told of the great experience and the great wisdom of this gentleman, clerk of the Committee on Public Lands. I have no doubt he knows as much as the gentleman from Pennsylvania claims for him, and therefore it would be well to make him Commissioner of the Land Office or Secretary of the Interior. [Laughter.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. WHITEHOUSE. I renew the amendment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of economy. It is a most excellent thing, but I am in favor of economizing in the right direction. I believe we should here in Congress legislate upon the same principles good business men and sound firms manage their own business affairs. If we have employés or assistants who are valuable, who know the whole routine of our business, who have grown up and made themselves perfectly familiar with it, we cannot afford to reduce their salaries and force them to secure employment elsewhere. Now, if I understand this aright, it is one of the most important clerkships in this House, and with due deference to the honorable gentleman who is the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, I think it is fully as important as, and to my mind more important than, the clerkship to his own committee.

I do not know personally in regard to the details of the business of this Committee on Public Lands, but if there is any big job to be carried through this or any other Congress, in my judgment, it will be carried through in these land bills. Therefore I say it is essentially necessary we should have a clerk for that committee who thoroughly understands the whole matter. This clerk having such large experience, being perfectly familiar with the duties of his office, it would be, I think, poor economy to reduce his salary at this time.

Mr. RANDALL. If the friends of this gentleman would do more voting and less talking, the sooner the proposition would be acted on.

Mr. HUBBELL. I only desire to suggest whether it is not best for us to vote on the proposition at once, for fear this clerk will "raise" on us before we get through with the discussion? [Laughter.]

Mr. SAYLER'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADDELL. I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all from and including the words "Chief Clerk," in line 126, down to and including the word "session," in line 155; and in lieu thereof to insert the following:

Chief Clerk and journal clerk, $3,000 each; two reading clerks and tally clerk, $2,700 each; disbursing clerk, file clerk, printing and bill clerk, enrolling clerk, and index clerk, $2,332.80 each; assistant to Chief Clerk, two enrolling clerks, resolution and petition clerk, stationery clerk, and newspaper clerk, $1,944 each; doorkeeper in stationery-room, distributing clerk, assistant index clerk, superintendent of document-room, assistant to clerk, $1,620; six assistant clerks, $1,300 each; six messengers, at $1,300 each; engineer, at $1,620; three assistant engineers, at $1,300 each; five firemen, at $1,090 each; one laborer, at $820; six laborers, at $720; one upholsterer and locksmith, at $1,300; one telegraph operator during the session, at $100 per month; one telegraph messenger and page, at $2.50 each, to be paid during the session.

Mr. WADDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am very well aware that in the present temper of the country and the House it is an ungracious task to resist anything like attempting to reduce the expenditures of the Government. I feel all that; but looking at this matter in connection with others I cannot go with the committee in the wholesale, sweeping reductions they have made in the Clerk's office. And I may say at the outset that if there is any gentleman on this floor who can offer this amendment with more propriety than myself I do not know it. If there is any gentleman on the floor of either party here who is less indebted to any officer of this House from the highest to the lowest for any favor or patronage of any kind than myself, I am not aware of it. Therefore, in offering this amendment, the only criticism to which I can be amenable is perhaps that of a want of judgment; and in view of some acts which have characterized the deliberations of this body at this session, I think I may claim, without undue assumption, an average amount of that faculty.

The present force of the Clerk's office is sixty-one. This bill proposes to reduce it to thirty-nine. The bill proposes to take twenty-two employés out of the Clerk's office, reducing the number to thirty-nine. It reduces the salaries from 16 to 37½ per cent., while reducing the force 36 per cent. My amendment reduces the force 13 per cent. and the salaries over $1,200 10 per cent.

In the Thirty-eighth Congress there were one hundred and ninety-six members, and fifty men were considered necessary in the Clerk's office. In the Forty-third Congress, as in this, there were three hundred and two members of the House, and the force, as I said a moment ago, was sixty-one. The bill proposes to reduce it to thirty-nine; so that while in the Thirty-eighth Congress, with one hundred and ninety-six members, fifty men were considered necessary, in this Congress, with three hundred and two members, thirty-nine employés are only considered necessary by the committee. There were less than one thousand bills introduced into the Thirty-eighth Congress. There were over five thousand bills introduced in the Forty-third Congress, and the same proportion of bills is being introduced in this Congress. There is also a similarly increased proportion of joint resolutions. My friend from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] explained this whole matter to the House the other day, but his statement did not, perhaps, attract as much attention as it ought, and I have therefore submitted the leading figures again.

The Clerk of the House has under his charge certain work which belongs to the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, as the care of the heating and ventilating apparatus and the document room; but his force is reduced twenty-two men, while the force of the Clerk of the Senate is only reduced four men.

Take the journal clerk of the House. I desire to call attention to what, with all respect to the committee, I cannot but consider a gross inequality in their bill. It is proposed in this bill to give the journal clerk $2,250, the salary of that officer heretofore having been $3,600, a reduction of 37½ per cent. At the same time the bill proposes to abolish the office of assistant journal clerk, who heretofore got $3,000. That is, this bill proposes to put on one man at a salary of $2,250 the work that has heretofore devolved on two men with salaries amounting to $6,600. That, I think, is scarcely just, and I will not vote for it. I know there was a special clause in favor of that distinguished parliamentarian, Mr. Barclay, whose absence I personally regret, limiting the salary of $3,600 to his term of office. But this bill reduces the journal clerk's salary, as I said a moment ago, from $3,600 to $2,250 and wipes out the assistant journal clerk entirely. I say that is unjust.

And so it runs all through this portion of the bill. Comments have been made on the salaries of the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations and the Chief Clerk. I do not think the pay allowed to the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations too much for his services, and I am glad to have that as it is. But I would wish that the salaries of these hard-worked employés, many of whom remain here the entire year, were reduced only the amount I have stated; that is, with a reduction of 13 per cent. in force, a reduction in salaries over $1,200 of 10 per cent. I would like to see that 10 per cent. reduction carried through the entire bill. I am ready to vote for that, but I cannot vote for the bill as reported to the House. I regret exceedingly that I have to antagonize a matter coming from a leading committee of which the majority are of my own party, and especially one having at its head the gentleman from Pennsylvania, with whom all my relations are of the most agreeable character.

Mr. MILLIKEN. Will the gentleman state what employés will be struck off by his amendment?

Mr. WADDELL. It strikes out eight men of the Clerk's office. It strikes out the chief messenger, saving $2,100. It strikes out the assistant journal clerk, saving $3,000 by that. It strikes out the librarian and assistant librarian, saving $4,320. It strikes out two folders, one at $1,314 and another at $1,440. It strikes out the clockman at $300, and it strikes out a fireman at $1,095. The total reduction in money by my amendment in the Clerk's office is $21,511.

Mr. WADDELL. I want a moment more. At present we pay $100,074 for this service and my amendment proposes to reduce that amount to $78,563, saving $21,500, or an average of a little more than 20 per cent., while by the bill the committee propose that the sum be reduced to $54,000 in round numbers.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Before I make any remarks in answer to the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL,] I will ask the Clerk to read a portion of the report of the Committee on Appropriations which I have marked in relation to this subject. It is very brief, but it explains somewhat the reasons why the committee have made this reduction.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee, in the re-organization of the offices and employés of the House, have been governed with a view of equity in respect to number and salaries of the respective departments of the House, their services, and necessary number to conduct the business of legislation which would seem to be just and proper; also, the fact of the necessity and importance of strict economy in this respect, which will be borne out throughout the bill in all the departments of the Government enumerated in this bill. We found from examination that the number, as well as their salaries, has been far greater than the services justified, and it has been the object of the committee to make such radical changes and modifications as would serve to place said force on a business basis, or upon such as a business man would establish for the conduct of his private affairs.

It will be seen that heretofore the appropriation bill has enumerated only in part the duties or positions and salaries of the respective clerks of the House, whereas this bill gives in detail the position of each. The number has been radically reduced, still leaving, however, as the committee believe, sufficient to discharge all the duties incumbent on them in the prompt and efficient aid of the legislation of the House. Many of them have been dropped. With the approbation of the Clerk, the salaries have been reduced in proportion to the duties and responsible position held by them, respectively.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Before taking action with regard to the employés in the Clerk's department, the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, of which I was a member, called on him for the pay-roll of his office, and we found that there were upon the pay-rolls the names of officers that were not authorized by law. I find upon his pay-roll, which I hold in my hand, quite a number of officers that were put down as folders that were paid out of the appropriation for folding; but I find on his pay-roll here the names of a number of gentlemen who I understand have never done any duty of any kind and have drawn their money out of the Treasury of the United States. I asked him how many employés were necessary to carry out the actual duties of his office, and I did not refer to folders and other employés of that character. He took the list and drew his pen through and struck out of the list quite a number of employés; for instance, a chief messenger; also, the assistant journal clerk and an assistant enrolling clerk, and quite a number of folders and laborers whom he had on his list here.

But, sir, I expect to confine myself in the remarks I now make particularly to the objection made by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] which refers expressly to the clerical force in the office of the Clerk. The committee only struck off three clerks in his department, making five in all. The committee believe from the information they had before them, and which they gathered from the books and an examination of the duties of the office, that the office could be conducted efficiently with the force recommended by this bill.

I will state in connection with this matter, Mr. Chairman, that the Clerk had taken folders and put them in the stationery-room and other departments under his control which was not authorized by law.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I simply desire to know whether the investigations of the committee of which the gentleman of Missouri is a member will warrant him in responding to this interrogatory, whether this impropriety, if so he deems it, of employing men in the folding-room and assigning them to the clerical force of the House is a matter new to this House, or whether it was not so in former Houses, and whether the present Clerk did not simply carry out the practice just as heretofore; and furthermore I would ask him whether there has been any addition to this unauthorized force in this House, as compared to the unauthorized force employed in preceding Congresses?

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. I will state that I have no knowledge as to the officers of the House under previous Clerks of the House. The only information that I have in regard to the officers I hold in my hand in this pay-roll; but I heard from the Clerk himself that he had ten folders in the Clerk's folding-room or document-room where there have not been five thousand books folded during the last two years. These folders, I presume, were employed as messengers around the several offices in the Clerk's department. I find here a superintendent of the stationery-room. The Committee on Appropriations have not been able to find any law either in the Book of Estimates or in the statutes of Congress authorizing a superintendent of the stationery-room. We find a superintendent here at a salary of $2,120 a year and an assistant or book-keeper at $1,800 a year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSE. Mr. Chairman, I move pro forma to strike out the last word. While I have every disposition in the world to support the bill of this committee, and also every other well-considered bill of every other committee of this House, yet, sir, I cannot give my sanction to the principle upon which this bill seems to be based.

Why, Mr. Chairman, what are we proposing to do? On what principle is this committee proceeding? The other day, when the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was explaining the principle upon which the committee was proceeding, he said:

Wherever we possessed the power we have reduced all the salaries above $1,200. We reduced none at or below $1,200, because we thought that would work peculiar hardship on those receiving small salaries. Upon what ground could the committee possibly stand in reducing all other salaries 10 per cent., and not reducing their own? For one, if any man in the committee had favored such a proposition as that, I would have been utterly unwilling to agree.

Now, Mr. Chairman, whatever opinion some gentlemen of this House may entertain as to whether the salary of a member of Congress should be likened to the salary of a clerk or employé of this House this committee has certainly not recognized that principle. What do we propose to do? We propose to reduce our own salaries only 10 per cent., and we propose to reduce the salaries of the clerks and employés of this House on an average of 22 per cent.

The chairman of the committee further said:

Having reduced all salaries 10 per cent., as we conceived the necessities of the times required us to do, we then turned our attention to supernumeraries; we fixed the amount of reduction of clerical force at 20 per cent.

The chairman of the committee says they have reduced the salaries 10 per cent. Sir, the committee has reduced the salaries of the employés and clerks of this House upon an average at least 22 per cent. The chairman furthermore said that they reduced the force 20 per cent. They have reduced the force of the employés and clerks of this House 36 per cent.

I would like to know how any committee can undertake to run through the Departments of this Government on such a scale of reduction of force. It cannot be done. Some Department may have more supernumerary force than others. But it would be the most extraordinary coincidence in the world if every Department of this Government had just 20 per cent. of supernumeraries and sinecures. Yet that is the principle, as the chairman said, on which the committee proceeded in this bill.

Sir, the force of this House is reduced below what it was in 1860. In 1860, when this House was composed of two hundred and forty-two members, the clerical force was forty-six and the cost of running the House was a little upward of $63,000. The committee proposes to reduce the clerical force of this House at this time to thirty-nine, and to reduce the entire cost of that clerical force to $9,000 below what it was in 1860, before the days of extravagance and demoralization set in.

I believe the amendment offered by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] is right, and I shall support it, and I think the members of this House ought to support it. What member of this House can go before an intelligent constituency and tell them that he is for economy and say, "We have reduced our own salaries 10 per cent.; but when we struck the poor clerks of the House we reduced them 37 per cent. in number and on an average 22 per cent. in compensation?" As I said in the beginning, if we agree to the propriety of reducing our own salaries, let us do so to an extent that will amount to something. If we should reduce the salaries of the members of this House the same per cent. that the salaries of the clerical force is reduced by this bill, then an amount of money will be saved that will be worth something. But for one I cannot agree to go before the country with such a record as this, to reduce my salary 10 per cent. and then reduce the salaries of these clerks, some of whom have to be here the entire year, some 30, some 25, and some 20 per cent.

Mr. RANDALL. First, in reference to the percentage of numerical decrease. That arises from the change made in the manner of conducting the folding-room. We propose an entirely different system. Heretofore, as shown by an examination of the accounts, every book that was folded, the paper, twine, and paste being supplied, cost us twenty cents. This was a gross and outrageous extravagance. The committee deemed it necessary to go back to the old system of awarding this work to the lowest bidder, making a stipulation that it should not be above a certain amount. So much for the reduction of the force.

It is well known to this House that the clerical force about the two branches of Congress has from time to time been increased beyond all reason. We do not have the opportunity even of remedying that great abuse for this session of Congress. Under the law we are now keeping up, and shall continue to keep up until the 1st day of July next, this large force, which, upon an examination by a subcommittee having no partisanship in it whatever, for it embraced one from each side of the House, we found to be too large and with salaries altogether too high by reason of past legislation.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RANDALL. In one moment. The subcommittee made their report, which was confirmed by the action of the entire committee, and rated the salaries of the clerical force of this House with salaries paid for like service and like responsibilities in other departments of the Government.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman to say that the committee had provided for the expenses of the folding-room by contract?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. CONGER. I would ask the gentleman whether any other of the duties about this House are provided for in this bill to be done by contract?

Mr. RANDALL. Not of members of Congress. Instead of paying twenty cents per volume for folding, we maintain that it can be done at one and a half cents, at the very highest, as it has heretofore been done.

Mr. CONGER. If the expense for folding is not embraced in this bill and if other expenses are not embraced in this bill, why did the gentleman claim that the amount saved by this bill was as much as he said, when he says that there are other expenditures of the former system not embraced in this bill?

Mr. RANDALL. We have reduced the expenditures enormously. The chairman of the subcommittee will state how much we will save by the changes proposed in this bill.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman to state in his opening speech on this bill that by the reductions proposed here the committee had made a great saving over former years. Now it appears that he has simply transferred some part of it to another bill for another appropriation.

Mr. RANDALL. Not at all. I made no such statement as that; and I did not intend to imply it or to have anybody infer it.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman to say the committee had not in this bill provided for folding, which was provided for in former bills.

Mr. RANDALL. A little further on the gentleman will find an appropriation for folding at what we estimate will be the cost of folding the entire number of books at the contract price.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman then has calculated beforehand what that contract price shall be.

Mr. RANDALL. We have fixed a maximum.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. Taking the previous Congress as a guide.

Mr. FOSTER. Did I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] to say that the subcommittee agreed to this part of the bill as now reported to the House?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir, I did not; I said that a subcommittee investigated all this subject; that the subcommittee was non-partisan, composed of one member on each side; that with slight modifications the committee indorsed the report. I believe that is correct.

Mr. FOSTER. The subcommittee, the gentleman will remember, made no report as to salaries.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. And did make a report for a larger force than is reported in this bill by three, I think.

Mr. RANDALL. By three only?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir, by three; about as suggested by the amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. RANDALL. Now, I have no doubt in the world that this Congress can be handled in its clerical duty by the force that is provided for in this bill. Besides, the reductions do not commence until the 1st day of July next.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DURHAM. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last letter. I desire to say a few words in regard to this bill, and more especially the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina. I have a great deal of confidence in the ability of the present Clerk of the House of Representatives to say to the House what is the necessary clerical force to carry on its business. I understand the Clerk to say that he cannot carry on the business of this House creditably with the force provided for in this bill. If that be true, I say it is the bounden duty of this House, in the interest of economy, to provide for the clerical force proposed by the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina. I am in favor of making all necessary and proper reductions in the clerical force in all the Departments, but I would not injure the public service in any regard by cutting off a single one of these clerks. We cannot do it in justice to ourselves.

So much in regard to the clerical force. I wish now to say a few words as to the amount of the salaries proposed in this bill; and upon this subject I really cannot do better than adopt the argument of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE.] It does appear to me exceedingly strange—and, mark you, I do not impugn the motives of the Committee on Appropriations at all, because, as I have said in a speech published in to-day's RECORD, I believe they have undertaken to act fairly and conscientiously in this matter, but I attribute their action to a lack of judgment, [laughter]—I say it is remarkably strange that the committee have cut down the messengers of this House subject to the Doorkeeper to $500 for the next year, while they retain the salary of their own messenger at $1,200 a year. Why is this distinction made? That part of the bill having been already passed, I need say nothing further on that point.

There is another thing. I admit the value of the services of the clerk of the Committee of Ways and Means and the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations, but why has their salary been reduced only $100 each, while the salaries of these reporters have been cut down $500, and that of your assistant journal clerk reduced from $3,600 to $2,250? I will not charge this to favoritism on the part of the committee, but I affirm before this House—because I am justified in so doing—that it is an improper and unjust distinction to make between public functionaries discharging their duties equally well.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman allow me to tell him the reason?

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman has had his time; I hope he will permit me to proceed without interruption. If the gentlemen on that committee will cut down their own messenger and their own clerk, as they have undertaken to cut down the clerks in this House who have proved themselves to be faithful and able, then I will go for the whole bill as it now stands. But I do undertake to say that the bill in its present form makes an invidious discrimination which I cannot support and at the same time sustain myself before the country. When we have reduced our own salary at the rate of only 10 per cent., as has been stated by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, and have cut down the compensation of some of these clerks to the extent of 27 and 30 per cent., or more, I say we cannot go before the country on a record of that sort. To make so great and disproportionate a reduction in the pay of these clerks, and a still larger reduction in the pay of these laboring-men who stand about the doors of this Hall from morning to night, is, I say, an unfair and invidious distinction which this House ought not to tolerate.

Mr. BLOUNT. Mr. Chairman, I regret that same gentleman has seen fit to turn this discussion into an attack upon the committee. The honorable gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSE] commenced his remarks by comparing the reduction of the pay of members of this House with that of our employés. It occurs to me, sir, and doubtless it did to every other gentleman, that the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts was correct in stating they were upon a different footing. The simple statement of the fact commends itself to the good sense of this intelligent body.

Now, sir, we will come to the employés of this House. The gentleman says he cannot consent to strike his pay down only 10 per cent. and cut down the employés of this House a far greater amount. It is well known by old members by reason of the employés, being in constant contact with members, that the service here has advanced with more rapid strides so far as pay is concerned than in any other department of the Government. Finding this to be true, an appeal was made to the committee that the employés of this House, just as the employés in the various Departments of the Government, should have their pay fixed upon some business principle. We compared them with the employés in the several Departments of the Government and endeavored to reduce them according to what we found to be the rate of compensation paid to those employés. We have not gone beyond that, notwithstanding the employés in the other Departments of the Government are continued in service from the beginning to the end of the year.

If gentlemen cannot find any other reason than that to charge this committee with having acted inconsistently, with having cut down their salary 10 per cent. while they have cut down that of the employés of this House 37 per cent., it does not show they are very earnest in assisting the committee in moving toward economical administration. I regret very much such attacks should have been commenced here. I had hoped this House, so far as its own employés are concerned, would be able to stand the test that they mean genuine retrenchment.

There is no one who regrets to do a service of this kind more than I do; but when I remember the purpose of this bill is to save $5,000,000 to the people of the country, and that other like bills to come after it are to save still more to the people, I will not hesitate to strike in that direction even if I strike my own friends.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, I wish to move an amendment to provide for the engineer of this House. In regard to the other questions, I propose to leave them to my friends on the other side in politics.

Now, among the curiosities that I have witnessed at Barnum's nothing has ever pleased me more than the "happy family." [Laughter.] But I certainly on the occasion of my visit to Barnum's, or here, would not wish to enter into the felicities of either. [Laughter.] But in regard to this engineer; he is a public benefactor. [Laughter.] It would be doing injustice to my own feelings, enjoying the pleasure he has given me while sitting in this House, to be silent when his compensation is in question. We have had all the pleasure of a Russian bath here. [Laughter.] The air at one moment we are in session is coming in at 110°, and twenty minutes after we have been brought into a profuse perspiration by the hot air that has been poured in upon the House we have the air blown in at a temperature of about 50°. [Laughter.] We can afford to pay for pleasures of this kind. [Laughter.] There is a sensation in our limbs, in our backs, in the mucous membrane, I feel to-night which I have not felt for the last eight and thirty years, that certainly calls upon us for some notice of the achievements of this individual. [Laughter.] There is not a doctor in the city of Washington who is not under obligations to him, and the dealers in linen pocket-handkerchiefs ought to contribute something to the salary of this gentleman. [Laughter.] I think, sir, his salary should be at least $2,500.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that it will not be necessary for me to attest by word the appreciation in which I hold the efforts of this Committee on Appropriations. From the beginning of this session until now the RECORD will show I have voted for every measure that committee has ever brought into the House. I have voted against any amendment that has been offered to any of their bills unless the committee accepted and approved it. I regret I am now called upon, in the discharge of what to me appears the plainest imaginable duty, not only to enter my protest by vote but to give it by voice against a bill which, with all due respect and proper appreciation for the effort that committee has made, appears to me to be undefinable and insupportable, either upon the score of principle, of precedent, or of consistency. In neither the one nor the other of these regards can the gentlemen of that committee support or maintain their present position before this House.

I will not go over the ground already traveled to show that there is no principle in this bill, in saying which I do not mean to impugn the motives of that committee at all. Starting out with a flourish of trumpets in reference to the 10 per cent. general reduction, we find them at sea on every section of their bill, their principle ignored and disregarded in practice. It is not only that we are least of all the sufferers by reason of these reductions that I protest. It is not alone because, as has been well said by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. HOUSE,] I am not willing to go before my people or before the country as a party to the reduction of salaries that costs me, one of the law-making power, but 10 per cent., while it costs the victims of that law-making power 30 or rather nearly 40 per cent.

It is not that alone. But, sir, upon the ground of precedent the gentlemen of the committee cannot defend their bill. I ask any member of the Committee on Appropriations to tell me when in the history of an American Congress the journal clerk of its House and the Chief Clerk of its House in point of pay were ever before subordinated to a clerk of a Ways and Means Committee or a clerk of an Appropriation Committee? Here is $2,440, I believe, given to each of the clerks of these two committees, and $2,250 is allowed the journal clerk at that desk and to the Chief Clerk of this House. And you find the messengers of this House, some of whom are forced to remain here during the year, brought down to $500, while the messenger of the Ways and Means Committee and the messenger of the Appropriation Committee are left at $1,200.

Worse than that, sir; this bill is not consistent. In one feature at least it is not a reducing bill at all, but it is a bill for a raising of salaries. I refer to line 169, on page 8. I find there, sir, that the paying-teller for the Sergeant-at-Arms is to have $2,000 by the bill. But looking at the appropriation act for the current year I find that the salary of that officer to-day is $1,800. That was the salary fixed for that officer by the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of this Government passed one year ago. This bill, in the line to which I have referred, raises his salary to $2,000. I was amazed to find that these gentlemen in their retrenchment——

Mr. CALDWELL, of Alabama. I find in the Official Register that the salary of that officer is stated at $2,500.

Mr. RANDALL. His salary is $2,100. That is what he received last year.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield further?

Mr. BLACKBURN. O, certainly.

Mr. EDEN. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Kentucky to the fact that when the appropriations for the clerks of the Senate were under consideration there was no complaint about a reduction of salary. It is only when it comes to a proposition to reduce the pay of the clerks of this House that the gentleman from Kentucky complains. The amendment of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. WADDELL] will give the clerks of this House a larger compensation——

Mr. BLACKBURN. I cannot yield further if this is to be taken from my time. If gentlemen will turn to the Statutes at Large for the Forty-third Congress, page 346, they will find that I certainly am supported by the declaration of the law in the statement which I have made. I find there in the statute this line:

Paying teller of the Sergeant-at-Arms, $1,800.

Mr. O'BRIEN. In support of the statement of the gentleman from Kentucky I may say that I hold in my hand the official copy of an appropriation bill passed at the last session of Congress, and the salary of that officer is there fixed at $1,800.

Mr. RANDALL. I have the authority of the Sergeant-at-Arms for stating, and his statement accords with my own recollection, that the present salary of that officer is $2,100.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Very well. If I am allowed to proceed I will say that if that paying teller of the Sergeant-at-Arms, who by the law passed last year is only entitled to $1,800, has been receiving $2,100, by reason of any subsequent appropriation made in his behalf, then the bill offered by the committee, according to their own statement of his salary, which does not agree with the law as I have quoted it, makes only a reduction of $100 out of a salary of $2,100.

Now I do say that it is clear to every member on this floor that that principle of 10 per cent. reduction has been abandoned. It is perfectly patent to every member of this House that on the score of precedent nothing is to be found that will warrant the subordination of the chief clerks of this House in point of pay to some of the clerks of its committees.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Just one word more. Let me say in justice to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that my attention is called to an addition of $300 made to the salary of the paying teller of the Sergeant-at-Arms. That leaves a reduction of but $100.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if these reductions are to be made, let us at least bear our fair portion of the burden. If the Government is not able to pay out the money that has been expended for these purposes heretofore let us make that reduction so far as we can without impairing the working efficiency of the service of this House, and let there be a pro rata reduction of the salaries of members on this floor; not excusing ourselves under a mere nominal reduction and leaving it to fall with full weight on these men who are unable to be heard.

Mr. WADDELL. I call for a vote on my amendment.

Mr. RANDALL. In reference to the question which has been mentioned by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] I want to say this, that we took into consideration the fact that this officer, the paying teller of the Sergeant-at-Arms, handles a million and a half of dollars a year, and we thought that $2,000, as the office is a responsible place, was not too large. We felt that it was not just to the Sergeant-at-Arms, who is responsible for the acts of his subordinates in connection with the handling of more than a million and a half of dollars, to reduce the salary too low; we had to discriminate.

An allusion has been made to the expense proposed now as compared with the years 1860 and 1861 or thereabouts. It was perhaps before the advent of the republican party into this Hall as a majority. In 1860, as will be seen in volume 12 of the Statutes at Large, page 93, the compensation of the officers, clerks, &c., of the House was $81,000; in 1861, as will be seen by volume 12 of the Statutes at Large, page 134, it was $95,000. Now even this bill appropriates more than double what the amount was in 1860, to wit, $173,000.

For myself, I have no earthly doubt that the House can be properly officered under the provisions of the bill.

Now, mark you, this bill does not take effect until the 1st of July next. We run these officers, as I have said before when the Senate branch was under discussion, five months nearly when they are doing no work. They then come here for four months, and they again run at the same rate for nine months without doing any service whatever. They run until the December after the 1st of July next, a period of seventeen months of pay with only four months' service. We give them four months' pay for the short session, because they have to spend two weeks in coming here and two weeks in going away; and if we should find that at the next session of Congress the House cannot be run at this cost, it will be time enough then to create temporary clerks to provide for the necessity.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to take any part in any family quarrel at all, but I see that there is a matter of difference between gentlemen on the other side, and I wish to point to the fact that the increase in the salary of the paying teller of the Sergeant-at-Arms arose in this way. The salary was $1,800, but when the corresponding bill to this was considered a year ago, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, moved to increase it to $2,100 and made a speech in favor of it, but that amendment was defeated. Subsequently, on his motion, in another bill, an additional $300 was put on, and the salary is now $2,100.

I wish to say, however, in this connection, Mr. Chairman, that I feel it my duty, notwithstanding the peculiarly changed positions in which the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself are placed, which is a little curious in many ways, to give my testimony as to what I consider the unwise reduction of the force about this Capitol, and particularly in the Clerk's department, in this bill.

Last year and the year before I did what I could to reduce the salaries of our leading clerks before us, and the persons connected immediately with us about the Capitol, and all this ground was fully gone over; but chief among those who resisted my views on that occasion, and on all those occasions in the two years past, was the present chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, [Mr. RANDALL.] The appropriation bill corresponding to this at the last session of Congress was defeated in four committees of conference, and only succeeded in passing in a fifth conference, chiefly because of the ability and persistence with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania insisted on keeping up or rather putting up the pay of the leading clerks in the employ of the Clerk of this House.

Mr. RANDALL. Allow me one word; you put millions into that bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. I must decline to yield until I have concluded what I have to say. Now let all that go by. The gentleman had his triumph and I had my defeat on that question. I have no doubt that the real true position that the House ought to take lies somewhere between my ground then and the ground of the gentleman from Pennsylvania now. Politically of course I can have no interest in this question, but I am here to say that in four years' experience in studying the wants of this House and the officers necessary to carry on its business this bill as it now stands is, in my judgment, a crippling of the necessary force to take care of the great and important business about this House. The force is reduced lower than we ever had it for fifteen years both in amount of the force and in the pay to that force.

For example, in reference to the clerical force: The pay of some of these clerks who sit before us was put up by the gentleman, for two of them to $3,600 and two of them $3,010 regular pay and $600 longevity pay, and the salaries of these officers are now reduced to $2,500, and five other clerks next to them in rank, whose pay was put up against my will to $3,000, (it ought to have been no more than $2,600,) are now cut down to $2,200.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, that the pay proposed by this bill for a large number of the employés of the House is too low, and I am very clear and certain that the number allowed is too low for the careful and proper transaction of the important business about this House.

Now let me say a word before the hammer falls in regard to a point made by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS,] in regard to folders. The number of people required to fold documents is always an uncertain quantity. In a year like this, with a Presidential election pending, you may have an enormous mass of documents to be folded. Next year you may not have the one-fortieth part of the documents to be folded that are folded this year. Therefore you cannot say just how many people will be needed to do the folding. It has been the custom for years to put a number of names on the roll of the folding-room, and when they are not needed for folding they are employed for clerical services, in positions about the House. Those on the rolls of the folding-room may do folding work or clerical work, as the necessities of the case may require.

Mr. WELLS, of Missouri. So much has been said in regard to the proposed reduction in the clerical force of this House, that I will move to strike out the last word of the amendment for the purpose of having an opportunity to make a few remarks.

As I have already stated, there have been only five clerks stricken from the rolls of the Clerk's office of this House. The Clerk himself without hesitation agreed to striking off that number. Those clerks are the assistant journal clerk, assistant enrolling clerk, resolution and petition clerk, assistant newspaper clerk, and the index clerk. That is all the reduction made in the force of the Clerk's office by the Committee on Appropriations in this bill. He has made no complaint, except in the case of one, may be two, of these assistant clerks; if he could have them returned to him he would have been satisfied.

The two additional laborers for the Clerk's office are all he claims. This bill provides for seventeen laborers for the Doorkeeper and ten laborers for the Clerk's office, making twenty-seven in all. The Clerk himself made some complaint before the subcommittee; but when we called his attention to the fact that he was receiving $7,300 a year as salary and perquisites, he concluded to say no more on that subject. Now to show how this has been made out, let me say that we found that the Clerk was allowed besides his regular salary a certain amount for disbursing the funds in his charge, and also certain allowances for horses. No casual observer can take up an appropriation bill and the laws relating to the Clerk's office and come to any other conclusion than that the Clerk of this House receives $7,300 annually at the present time.

The Clerk now receives an annual salary of $4,320. As disbursing officer of this House he receives in addition $576, and he receives $2,737.50 for three horses, for which the Government provides a stable, a hostler to take care of them, and a driver to drive them. All the expense the Clerk is to for the three horses is for shoeing and feeding them. After paying all those expenses, he receives altogether $7,300 a year. It is likely he would be glad to have his compensation continued at that rate.

So far as the salaries of some of these clerks are concerned they might, perhaps, be raised slightly from the amounts proposed in this bill, but not, in my opinion, to the extent proposed by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. WADDELL.] So far as the number is concerned, that might be increased by one. But what is the fact? The Clerk not only wants his office filled up with clerks sitting there doing nothing, but he wants a messenger or servant at each door at the bidding of every clerk in his employ.

It is not only in this House that this kind of organization is in vogue; it is to be found all over Washington. You cannot go to a hotel or a boarding-house without finding an organization of force like the one that is here fighting this appropriation bill. I am sorry to see members of this House who may have friends here, people from their districts or States, rising here and endeavoring to carry out the wishes of these officials of the House. Many of these officers I know personally; but if they were my blood relations I would not stand here and advocate their cause to the detriment of the interests of the people of this whole country.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the committee now rise.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion for a moment, until I can make a brief statement.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The CHAIRMAN. The regular order is the motion that the committee now rise

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. SPRINGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. COX reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the special order, being a bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. ADAMS: The petition of Messrs. Van Heusen, Charles & Co. and others, for a uniform rate of duty of 30 per cent. upon crockery, china, glassware, &c., to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. GUNTER: Memorial of Cave Hill College, Arkansas, for compensation for college building destroyed by United States troops, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. HOPKINS: Remonstrance of workingmen in the employ of the United States Iron and Tin Plate Company, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, against a reduction in the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, remonstrance of 350 workingmen in the iron-mills of Lewis, Oliver & Phillips, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of workingmen in the iron-mill of Moorhead & Co., of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of workingmen in the iron-mill of Anderson & Woods, of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. HOOKER: The petition of D. W. Booth, M. D., for compensation for the ground upon which stands the Grant and Pemberton monuments, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. JENKS: Memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, against any change in the existing tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. JONES, of Kentucky: Memorial of citizens of Kentucky, that proper measures be taken for the release of E. O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States now held a prisoner by the government of Great Britain, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, joint resolution of the Legislature of Kentucky, requesting the Representatives in Congress from that State to take such steps as will secure the release of E. O'M. Condon, a naturalized citizen of the United States imprisoned by the British government, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of the owners of steel and iron works and workingmen engaged therein, in Kenton County, Kentucky, protesting against any change in the existing tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LAPHAM: Resolutions of the common council of New York City, favoring the improvement of Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvil Creek, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Resolutions of the Philadelphia Board of Steam Navigation, remonstrating against the bill to re-organize the Light-House Board, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. O'BRIEN: Two petitions of wholesale druggists of Baltimore, for the definition of the powers and duties of officers of the internal revenue and to further provide for the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. POWELL: The petition of A. J. Muchant and 500 citizens, and of Mrs. A. J. McIntyre and 683 ladies, for the appointment of a commission to investigate and report the general effects of the liquor traffic on the United States and for other purposes, to the same committee.

By Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania: Remonstrance of citizens of Lancaster County, Pennsylvania, against changing the tariff laws, to the same committee.

By Mr. SWANN: Memorial of J. O. Peck, M. R. Creighten, V. H. Thompson, and 237 other citizens of Baltimore, Maryland, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, and to prohibit its sale in the District of Columbia and Territories, to the same committee.

By Mr. THOMAS: The petition of citizens of Maryland, importers and dealers in crockery, china, and glass ware, for a reduction of duties thereon, to the same committee.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York: Remonstrance of a convention of delegates representing the seven yearly meetings of the religious Society of Friends in the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Virginia, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, and Iowa, against the transfer of the care of the Indians to the War Department, to the Committee on Appropriations.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of R. L. McConnaughey, for compensation for carrying the United States mail in North Carolina in 1866, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. WALDRON: A paper relating to a post-route from Milan, via York and Saline, to Ann Arbor, Michigan, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York: The petition of James Rogers, John Hargroves, and 101 others, that no change be made in the tariff laws at this time, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the petition of A. B. Wood and 54 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILSON, of Iowa: The petition of citizens of Blairstown, for a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 31, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress."

The bill (H. R. No. 2817) to regulate the pay and allowances of Army officers was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF UNITED STATES GEOGRAPHICAL SURVEYS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That the following distribution shall be made of the reports of the United States geographical surveys west of the one hundredth meridian, published in accordance with acts approved June 23, 1874, and February 15, 1875, as the several volumes are issued from the Government Printing Office, to wit, nine hundred and fifty copies of each to the House of Representatives, two hundred and fifty copies of each to the Senate, and eight hundred copies of each to the War Department for its uses.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Commerce, a communication from the Chief of Engineers, submitting a copy of a letter from Major J. M. Wilson, Corps of Engineers, explaining why the survey of the mouth of Nehalim River and of Alsea River and bar, Oregon, contemplated in the act of March 3, 1875, has not been made, and recommending, for reasons stated, the postponement of that survey; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. McCREERY presented a petition of workingmen of Boyd County, Kentucky, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Lena Bensinger, praying to have restored to her certain money alleged to have been wrongfully taken from her late husband, Nathan Bensinger, as surety on the bond of Dohn & Marks, brewers, of Louisville, Kentucky, charged with violating the internal-revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of workingmen of Mahoning County, Ohio, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented two petitions of workingmen of Erie County, New York, and a petition of workingmen of Clinton County, New York, praying that the tariff laws may remain undisturbed for the present; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. McMILLAN. I present a memorial of Irish-American citizens of Saint Paul, Minnesota, in mass-meeting assembled, signed by their officers, relative to the imprisonment in England of Edward O'Meagher Condon. The officers who presided over the meeting are highly respectable gentlemen. The chairman of the meeting is one of our best citizens. I ask that the memorial be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

Your memorialists, citizens of the United States, residing at Saint Paul, Minnesota, respectfully call the attention of your honorable body to the case of Edward O'M. Condon, a citizen of the United States, and a brave soldier in the Army of the Union during the late war, who has for the last nine years been confined under, and is now undergoing, a life-sentence, passed upon him by one of the English courts at Manchester, in that country.

The offense for which he was convicted grew out of and was intimately connected with an alleged insurrection against the English government, then occurring at Manchester, and which was in this instance manifested by an attempted rescue in the streets of that city of some political prisoners.

In the excitement that followed a large number of suspected persons were arrested and tried by a special commission, and among those convicted was Edward O'M. Condon.

During the last nine years an opportunity has been given for a calm and dispassionate review of the evidence upon which he was convicted, and many facts recently brought to light have led your memorialists to believe that he was wholly innocent of the alleged crime for which he is now being punished and that his conviction was in a great measure, if not wholly, due to the intense political excitement then existing in England.

To the end therefore that justice may be still done or a justifiable mercy exercised, and that the life of a brave and patriotic Union soldier, which has been freely periled in her behalf, may by a grateful country be permitted to terminate in peace and honor and relieved from the odium of an alleged felony, we ask that your honorable body may cause the Department of State to cause the case of Edward O'M. Condon to be investigated, to the end that, if innocent, his release may be required, or that a judicious mercy may be exercised in his behalf.

And your memorialists as in duty bound will ever pray, &c.

Saint Paul, March 17, 1876.

The Irish-American citizens of Saint Paul, Minnesota, in mass meeting assembled, by—

PATRICK H. KELLY,
Chairman.
HENRY O'GORMAN,
Secretary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT. I present the petition of O. M. Barrett, Charles Allen, and some thousand or twelve hundred other citizens of Northwestern Iowa, reciting that by act of Congress approved May 12, 1864, a grant of land was made to aid in the construction of a railroad from McGregor, in that State, on or near the forty-second parallel, to intersect a line of road running from Sioux City to the northern line of Iowa, in O'Brien County; reciting also that that road is completed to Algona, in that State, but that the lands granted by Congress are largely located west of that point; and that settlements have been made upon the expectation that that road was to be constructed from Algona to the point named in the act of May 12, 1864, but that they understand propositions are made to change the route of that road; and also the terminus upon the road from Sioux City to the northern line of the State. They remonstrate against any change or diversion of the line of the road by Congress. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Railroads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I present the memorial of the Boston Board of Trade, remonstrating against any alteration of the Light-House Board. As that subject has been reported on by the Committee on Commerce, I move that this memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present a memorial of the representative Baptist ministers on the Pacific coast, among which are the names of the Baptist pastors in the city of San Francisco, who state that they believe that "all just government is founded on civil and religious liberty, and that it is unjust to tax, for the support of any sectarian or religious institution, those who are conscientiously opposed thereto," and they pray that this body will adopt a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution, "to be ratified by the States, that neither the United States, nor any State, Territory, or other civil jurisdiction therein, shall appropriate any money or property for any purpose, directly or indirectly, to any religious body or sect." I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE presented a memorial of workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented the petition of J. W. Toms & Co. and other importers and dealers in china, glass ware, and crockery, praying that a uniform duty of 30 per cent. be levied upon earthen ware, crockery, glass ware, and china, exclusive of packages, inland freight, shipping charges, and commissions; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

JAMES B. SINCLAIR.

Mr. CLAYTON. The other day in making some reports from the Committee on Military Affairs I erroneously reported adversely upon the bill (S. No. 216) for the relief of Lieutenant James B. Sinclair, United States Army, under the impression that the Committee had directed me to report that bill. That was a mistake. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAWES. I am instructed by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 485) for the relief of Julia E. Seeley, postmaster at Great Barrington, Massachusetts, to report it with amendments; and as it relates to a matter that has been passed upon several times in the Senate upon similar bills, I ask that it may be acted upon now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You had better let it go until to-morrow.

Mr. DAWES. There is a written report which explains the case. The bill is merely to pay for stamps. The safe was blown up by professional burglars from the city of New York, and the Post-Office Department report that the postmaster exercised all due care and that she ought to be paid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have almost always opposed these bills, but without any particular success, and perhaps I should not attempt fruitless opposition in this instance, which is probably as good as any of them; but still I think we ought to see the report in print and see that the case comes fully up to the rule, as I dare say it does.

Mr. DAWES. It will only take one moment to pass the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It will not make any special difference to wait until we can have the report printed. There will be no objection to taking it up then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont object to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 38) granting a pension to Charles C. Daniels, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1455) granting a pension to Griffin Chavers, late a private in Company C, Ninth Regiment of United States Heavy Artillery, (colored,) submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1345) revising and amending the various acts establishing and relating to the Reform School in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY, from the Committee on Territories, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 483) to regulate elections and the elective franchise in the Territory of Utah, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Ephraim P. Abbott, praying for the entry and purchase of a piece of land as a second or back concession in rear of private land claim No. 667, Wayne County, Michigan, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 678) for the relief of Ephraim P. Abbott.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred a resolution directing that committee to inquire and report whether the monuments erected by order of the Senate to the memory of deceased Senators have been placed over the remains of those Senators and suitably inscribed, and also whether there are any deceased Senators not honored by the erection of monuments, reported a bill (S. No. 679) relating to interments in the Congressional Cemetery; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 15th February, instructing that committee to inquire into the necessity of repaving Pennsylvania avenue from the Capitol grounds to Fifteenth street, and to ascertain the best material to be used, &c., submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 680) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

The bill was read twice by its title, and, on motion of Mr. DORSEY, recommitted to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator ask that the report be printed?

Mr. DORSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Reports are always printed under the rule.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. DAWES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 681) for the relief of Marie Barton Greene; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 683) for the relief of the officers and privates of the Fourth Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HAMILTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Edward T. Ryan, late a lieutenant, United States Army, be withdrawn from the files.

On motion of Mr. McDONALD, it was Ordered, That James Coloway have leave to withdraw his petition and papers from the files of the Senate.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that when the Senate adjourn to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORTON. I hope before that motion is adopted we shall see what we can get through with to-day. I hope we shall not agree to adjourn over until the pending business is disposed of.

Mr. WHYTE. I withdraw the motion for the present if there is objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very likely there will not be by and by.

JOINT RULE ON APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I offer a joint rule for the consideration of the Committee on Rules:

The general appropriation bills shall be confined to appropriations necessary to carry into effect existing laws, and shall not be open to legislative provisions, except such as relate to the expenditure of the moneys therein appropriated.

I move the reference of this proposed joint rule to the Committee on Rules; and as I have the chairman of the committee [Mr. FERRY] right before me, where he cannot get away, I wish to say a word upon the reason of the rule proposed.

I am encouraged by the debate in the Senate, a few days ago, to offer this amendment to the rules, which I had already intended to propose. Of course I do not suppose that it can be made applicable to the present session, for the business is too far advanced; but the evil which it proposes to arrest is one that has been brought especially to the attention of the Senate, on the last appropriation bill; and I think there can hardly be but one opinion upon it.

The general appropriation bills are necessary to carry on the Government. They are, therefore, sure to pass; and however they may be overloaded with objectionable legislation, very few Senators are willing to take the responsibility of voting against them upon the question of their passage. Therefore it is liable to happen that the friends of several measures, neither of which alone could command a majority of the Senate, will combine, and put the whole upon an appropriation bill which carries itself and them with it. This vicious mode of legislation has long been a matter of complaint, and has been met by several restrictive rules, which partially restrain, but do not altogether prevent it. By our rule, it is forbidden to move upon an appropriation bill an amendment to pay a private claim, or to make additional appropriations, unless it be to carry out the provisions of some existing law, or some act or resolution previously passed by the Senate, during that session, or moved by direction of a standing or select committee of the Senate, or in pursuance of an estimate from the head of a Department. These exceptions allow a very wide latitude. Yet the restraint upon amendments for appropriations moved by individual Senators, on their own responsibility alone, is healthful, and makes a great saving of time, by cutting off the discussion on propositions that are sure to fail.

We have another rule to that effect which allows a motion to be made to lay on the table an amendment to an appropriation bill without carrying the bill with it. But the facility with which estimates can be extorted from the heads of Departments and recommendations wrung from committees open the bills to enormous additions.

A greater evil has been the passage of legislation on the appropriation bills, often legislation that had no connection with the subject of the bill. This, too, has been restricted by special rules, adopted for the passing session and generally toward the close, when it became apparent that otherwise the necessary business could not be transacted. The Senate has not, however, adopted a standing rule to that effect.

The true idea of an appropriation bill is a bill to provide the money necessary to carry into effect existing laws, without amendment of those laws, except so far as relates to the expenditure of the sums therein appropriated. This would reduce the appropriation bills to simple business statutes; it would confine the discussion to the character and amount of the appropriations, and to their economical and judicious expenditure. It would subject them to a more rigid scrutiny, and, by relieving them from all extraneous matters, would place in a clearer view the cost of each branch and each department of the public service.

It is the purpose of this rule to give this character to the appropriation bills. Another modification I would like; a limit of every appropriation to the estimates of the Treasury, so that every officer charged with the control of the expenditures would act under the responsibility of his own recommendations. This I believe is the rule of the British Parliament. I do not, however, venture to propose this, fearing that it would be regarded as too great a departure from the existing system, and as a limitation upon the power of Congress. Yet if such a provision were made, applicable to the general appropriation bills alone, it would not prevent supplemental bills making original appropriations or increasing those in the general bills. But there should be no question of the equal right of either House to originate such measures. Indeed there is no question now, although by custom the appropriation bills have originated in the House. Once, in the Thirty-sixth Congress, when the Senate, weary of the delay of the House, passed several appropriation bills and sent them to the House, the House laid them on the table, and sent back other bills. The Senate raised no question on the subject, but I suppose no Senator doubts the right of the Senate to originate appropriation bills. In fact, we do it every day in private bills.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And in many public bills of small amounts.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Vermont suggests that it is so with many public bills of small amounts, like bills for the erection of light-houses, and other appropriations of various kinds. If it should be thought, however, that in the emergencies of the closing session, it might be sometimes quite necessary to legislate upon an appropriation bill, one bill might be excepted from the rule, as the sundry civil bill, the omnibus bill as it is generally called, although my opinion is that the advantages to be gained by a rigid adherence to this rule would more than compensate for all its inconvenience.

I move the reference of the proposed rule to the Committee on Rules, and that it be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. MORTON December 15, 1875, as modified by him on the 27th instant, namely:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi (in 1875) for members of Congress and State officers and members of the Legislature was characterized by great frauds committed upon and violence exercised toward the colored citizens of that State and the white citizens disposed to support their rights at the election, and especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting, or compelled to vote, contrary to their wishes, for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise, as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, thus practically denied and violated, and that such intimidation has been since continued for the purpose of affecting future elections; and whereas the people of all the United States have an interest in and a right to insist upon the enforcement of this constitutional amendment, and Congress, having the power to enforce it by appropriate legislation, cannot properly neglect the duty of providing the necessary legislation for this purpose: Therefore,

Resolved, That a committee of five Senators be appointed by the Chair to investigate the truth of these allegations, and to inquire how far these constitutional rights have in the said election been violated by force, fraud, or intimidation, and to inquire and report to the Senate, before the end of the present session, whether any, and, if so, what, further legislation is necessary to secure to said colored citizens the free enjoyment of their constitutional rights; and that said committee be empowered to visit said State, to send for persons and papers, to take testimony on oath, and to use all necessary process for these purposes.

Mr. BRUCE Mr. President, I had hoped that no occasion would arise to make it necessary for me again to claim the attention of the Senate until at least I had acquired a larger acquaintance with its methods of business and a fuller experience in public affairs; but silence at this time would be infidelity to my senatorial trust and unjust to both the people and the State I have the honor in part to represent.

The conduct of the late election in Mississippi affected not merely the fortunes of partisans—as the same were necessarily involved in the defeat or success of the respective parties to the contest—but put in question and jeopardy the sacred rights of the citizen; and the investigation contemplated in the pending resolution has for its object not the determination of the question whether the offices shall be held and the public affairs of that State be administered by democrats or republicans, but the higher and more important end, the protection in all their purity and significance of the political rights of the people and the free institutions of the country. I believe the action sought is within the legitimate province of the Sentate; but I shall waive a discussion of that phase of the question, and address myself to the consideration of the importance of the proposed investigation.

The demand of the substitute of the Senator from Michigan proceeds upon the allegation that fraud and intimidation were practiced by the opposition in the late State election, so as not only to deprive many citizens of their political rights, but so far as practically to have defeated a fair expression of the will of a majority of the legal voters of the State of Mississippi, resulting in placing in power many men who do not represent the popular will.

The truth of the allegations relative to fraud and violence is strongly suggested by the very success claimed by the democracy. In 1873 the republicans carried the State by 20,000 majority; in November last the opposition claimed to have carried it by 30,000; thus a democratic gain of more than 50,000. Now, by what miraculous or extraordinary interposition was this brought about? I can conceive that a large State like New York, where free speech and free press operate upon intelligent masses—a State full of railroads, telegraphs, and newspapers—on the occasion of a great national contest, might furnish an illustration of such a thorough and general change in the political views of the people; but such a change of front is unnatural and highly improbable in a State like my own, with few railroads, and a widely scattered and sparse population. Under the most active and friendly canvass the voting masses could not have been so rapidly and thoroughly reached as to have rendered this result probable.

There was nothing in the character of the issues nor in the method of the canvass that would produce such an overwhelming revolution in the sentiments of the colored voters of the State as is implied in this pretended democratic success. The republicans—nineteen-twentieths of whom are colored—were not brought, through the press or public discussions, in contact with democratic influences to such an extent as would operate a change in their political convictions, and there was nothing in democratic sentiments nor in the proscriptive and violent temper of their leaders to justify such a change of political relations.

The evil practices so naturally suggested by this view of the question as probable will be found in many instances by the proposed investigation to have been actual. Not desiring to anticipate the work of the committee nor to weary Senators with details, I instance the single county of Yazoo as illustrative of the effects of the outrages of which we complain. This county gave in 1873 a republican majority of nearly two thousand. It was cursed with riot and bloodshed prior to the late election, and gave but seven votes for the republican ticket, and some of these, I am credibly informed, were cast in derision by the democrats, who declared that republicans must have some votes in the county.

To illustrate the spirit that prevailed in that section, I read from the Yazoo Democrat, an influential paper published at its county seat:

Let unanimity of sentiment pervade the minds of men. Let invincible determination be depicted on every countenance. Send forth from our deliberative assembly of the eighteenth the soul-stirring announcement that Mississippians shall rule Mississippi though the heavens fall. Then will woe, irretrievable woe, betide the radical tatterdemalions. Hit them hip and thigh, everywhere and at all times.

Carry the election peaceably if we can, forcibly if we must.

Again:

There is no radical ticket in the field, and it is more than likely there will be none; for the leaders are not in this city, and dare not press their claims in this county.

Speaking of the troubles in Madison County, the Yazoo City Democrat for the 26th of October says:

Try the rope on such characters. It acts finely on such characters here.

The evidence in hand and accessible will show beyond peradventure that in many parts of the State corrupt and violent influences were brought to bear upon the registrars of voters, thus materially affecting the character of the voting or poll lists; upon the inspectors of election, prejudicially and unfairly thereby changing the number of votes cast; and, finally, threats and violence were practiced directly upon the masses of voters in such measure and strength as to produce grave apprehensions for their personal safety, and as to deter them from the exercise of their political franchises.

Lawless outbreaks have not been confined to any particular section of the country, but have prevailed in nearly every State at some period in its history. But the violence complained of and exhibited in Mississippi and other Southern States, pending a political canvass, is exceptional and peculiar. It is not the blow that the beggared miner strikes that he may give bread to his children, nor the stroke of the bondsman that he may win liberty for himself, nor the mad turbulence of the ignorant masses when their passions have been stirred by the appeals of the demagogue; but it is an attack by an aggressive, intelligent, white political organization upon inoffensive, law-abiding fellow-citizens; a violent method for political supremacy, that seeks not the protection of the rights of the aggressors, but the destruction of the rights of the party assailed. Violence so unprovoked, inspired by such motives, and looking to such ends, is a spectacle not only discreditable to the country, but dangerous to the integrity of our free institutions.

I beg Senators to believe that I refer to this painful and reproachful condition of affairs in my own State not in resentment, but with sentiments of profound regret and humiliation.

If honorable Senators ask why such flagrant wrongs were allowed to go unpunished by a republican State government, and unresented by a race claiming 20,000 majority of the voters, the answer is at hand. The civil officers of the State were unequal to meet and suppress the murderous violence that frequently broke out in different parts of the State, and the State executive found himself thrown for support upon a militia partially organized and poorly armed. When he attempted to perfect and call out this force and to use the very small appropriation that had been made for their equipment, he was met by the courts with an injunction against the use of the money, and by the proscriptive element of the opposition with such fierce outcry and show of counter-force, that he became convinced a civil strife, a war of races, would be precipitated unless he staid his hand. As a last resort, the protection provided in the national Constitution for a State threatened with domestic violence was sought; but the national Executive—from perhaps a scrupulous desire to avoid the appearance of interference by the Federal authority with the internal affairs of that State—declined to accede to the request made for Federal troops.

It will not accord with the laws of nature or history to brand the colored people as a race of cowards. On more than one historic field, beginning in 1776 and coming down to this centennial year of the Republic, they have attested in blood their courage as well as love of liberty. I ask Senators to believe that no consideration of fear or personal danger has kept us quiet and forbearing under the provocations and wrongs that have so sorely tried our souls. But feeling kindly toward our white fellow-citizens, appreciating the good purposes and offices of the better classes, and, above all, abhorring a war of races, we determined to wait until such time as an appeal to the good sense and justice of the American people could be made.

A notable feature of the outrages alleged is that they have referred almost exclusively to the colored citizens of the State. Why is the colored voter to be proscribed? Why direct the attack upon him? While the methods of violence, resorted to for political purposes in the South, are foreign to the genius of our institutions as applied to citizens generally—and so much is conceded by even the opposition—yet they seem to think we are an exceptional class and citizens, rather by sufferance than right; and when pressed to account for their bitterness and proscription toward us they, with more or less boldness, allege incompetent and bad government as their justification before the public opinion of the country. Now, I declare that neither political incapacity nor venality are qualities of the masses of colored citizens. The emancipation of the colored race during the late civil strife was an expression alike of the magnanimity and needs of the nation; and the subsequent and early subtraction of millions of industrial values from the resources of the insurrectionary States and the presence of many thousand additional brave hearts and strong hands around the flag of the country vindicated the justice and wisdom of the measure.

The close of the war found four millions of freedmen, without homes or property, charged with the duty of self-support and with the oversight of their personal freedom, yet without civil and political rights! The problem presented by this condition of things was one of the gravest that has ever been submitted to the American people. Shall these liberated millions of a separate race, while retaining personal liberty, be deprived of political rights? The practical sense of the American people definitely settled this delicate and difficult question, and the demand for a more pronounced loyal element in the work of reconstruction in the lately rebellious States furnished an opportunity for the recognition of the political rights of the race, both in the interest of justice and good government.

The history of my race since enfranchisement, considered in connection with the difficulties that have environed us, will exhibit hopeful progress and attest that we have been neither ungrateful for the civil and political privileges received nor wanting in appreciation of the correspondingly weighty obligations imposed upon us.

As evidence, not only of our aptitude for improvement but of our actual progress since 1865, I submit a partial but nevertheless illustrative statistical statement gathered from the census of 1860 and 1870 and from data obtained by the State authorities in the interval between these periods. The statistics cover the questions of marriage, churches, and industrial pursuits. I avail myself of exhibits and comments on these points found in the annual message of my colleague, an ex-slaveholder, to the Legislature of Mississippi, session of 1871:

Marriage statistics.

Class.	Population in 1860.	Marriage licenses issued.
		1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	189,645	2,708	3,129	2,829	2,546	2,655	2,204
Colored	239,930	564	3,679	3,524	2,802	3,584	3,427

The percentages of those white marriages to the total number of the whites, and of those colored marriages to the total number of the colored, are as follows, namely:

Class.	1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	1.43	1.64	1.49	1.34	1.40	1.16
Colored	0.23	1.53	1.47	1.17	1.49	1.43

Governor ALCORN, in commenting on the marriage statistics that represent fully thirty-one counties of the State, says:

A people trained under circumstances precluding the marriage contract stood exposed, when released from restraints of force, to the danger of running into extreme sexual license. Our constitution anticipated such a social evil, and therefore dignified all who had been living together in the intercourse of the sexes under slavery by giving them in law the status of husband and wife. * * *

These figures are full of encouragement to men who doubted the practicability of educating the great body of our labor to the moral level of freedom. They will be read with surprise, when taken in connection with the fact that up to the close of the war the negro was incapable of making a contract of marriage. They prove conclusively that the colored people are striving to rise to the moral level of their new standing before the law, to the extent of a strict adherence to, at all events, the formularies of sexual propriety.

But the marriage contracts of the negroes are not mere formularies. Taking the production of children as an evidence of marital fidelity—which it is held to be—the census of the six counties selected as a basis of my inquiries bears the following evidence to the general good faith of the colored people in contracts of marriage:

Population by ages.

Class.	Total number.	Under 1 year.	From 1 to 5 years.	From 5 to 10 years.	From 10 to 60 years.	Over 60 years.
White	33,092	6.09	10.52	13.13	66.92	3.38
Colored	43,748	7.31	11.16	14.57	63.25	3.70

The table of population embraces six counties, and is submitted to show the purity of the marriage relations among the colored people. The governor in commenting thereon adds:

The fact remains on the face of the national inventory that the colored people show in the proportion of their infants a rate of production which constitutes an incontestable proof that negro marriages are, as a rule, observed with encouraging fidelity.

Number of churches.

Class.	Population in 1860.	Years.
		1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	138,991	510	505	528	531	548	563
Colored	179,677	105	125	165	201	235	288

Number of preachers employed.

Class.	Population in 1860.	Years.
		1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	125,629	328	339	343	349	373	354
Colored	162,733	73	102	134	177	194	262

These tables embrace returns from twenty-two counties, and the governor commenting says:

The religious progress among the negroes shown in this table, in corroboration of that shown in the table next preceding, is full of good omen for the perfection of the work you, gentlemen, have inaugurated for crowning the State of Mississippi with the peace and prosperity of a well-ordered society of free labor.

Number of shoemaker's shops.

Class.	Population in 1860.	Years.
		1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	105,023	99	104	101	94	93	99
Colored	165,169	21	28	24	49	54	63

Number of smith's shops.

Class.	Population in 1860.	Years.
		1865.	1866.	1867.	1868.	1869.	1870.
White	105,896	128	128	145	152	157	182
Colored	156,556	40	63	74	83	98	113

The exhibit shows not only the enterprise of the colored man under great embarrassment, but his aptitude for skilled and diversified labor, and is so far favorable, not only to his diligence, but intelligent capacity.

Tenant-farming.

Class.	Bales produced.
	1869.	1870.
White	27,075	20,893
Colored	40,561	50,978

The governor very appropriately selects this form of agricultural endeavor as illustrative of the thrift of the negro, and in connection therewith adds:

Tenant-farming has expanded among the whites since 1860 about 100 per cent. In that year it was, of course, unknown among the negroes.

* * * * * *

The improvidence of the negro is another subject of popular apprehension as to his future under freedom. The laws of 1865 had excluded him from putting that accusation to trial by having made him a pariah.

A military government is certainly not a very favorable school for the development of industry and thrift. And yet the inauguration of that rule was the first moment at which the negro had, in fact, had the opportunity of realizing wealth. Four years have passed since that time, and but one of four years has been blessed with civil government; and now, at the expiration of that brief period, what evidence do we find on which to found an opinion as to the future identity of the negro with the direct interests of property?

Negro property owners in the seven counties.

69 colored people own real estate to a gross value of	$30,680
3,798 colored people own personalty to a gross value of	630,860
178 colored people own both realty and personalty to a gross value of	22?,700

The governor adds:

Among the forty-three thousand negroes of Washington, Madison, Holmes, Rankin, Neshoba, Jones, and Lauderdale, who had been plucked pennyless four short years ago from the clutches of the unwise legislation of 1865, three thousand four hundred and forty-one accumulated wealth—what the economists hold to represent the political virtue of "denial"—to the enormous amount of $882,240! And here again is undoubted proof that the industry and thrift of the negro are developing with extraordinary rapidity the production of a mass of property-owners who constitute an unimpeachable guarantee that reconstruction goes forward to the consolidation of a society in which the reward of labor goes hand in hand with the safety of property.

The data here adduced, though not exhaustive, is sufficiently full to indicate and illustrate the capacity and progress of this people in the directions specified, and the fuller statistics, derived from subsequent and later investigations, and exhibiting the operation of the more liberal and judicious legislation and administration introduced since 1870, will amply sustain the conclusion authorized by the facts I have adduced. I submit that the showing made, relative to the social, moral, and industrial condition of the negro, is favorable, and proves that he is making commendable and hopeful advances in the qualities and acquisitions desirable as a citizen and member of society; and, in these directions, attest there is nothing to provoke or justify the suspicion and proscription with which he has been not infrequently met by some of his more highly favored white fellow-citizens.

Again, we began our political career under the disadvantages of the inexperience in public affairs that generations of enforced bondage had entailed upon our race. We suffered also from the vicious leadership of some of the men whom our necessities forced us temporarily to accept. Consider further that the States of the South, where we were supposed to control by our majorities, were in an impoverished and semi-revolutionary condition—society demoralized, the industries of the country prostrated, the people sore, morbid, and sometimes turbulent, and no healthy controlling public opinion either existent or possible—consider all these conditions, and it will be seen that we began our political novitiate and formed the organic and statutory laws under great embarrassments.

Despite the difficulties and drawbacks suggested, the constitutions formed under colored majorities, whatever their defects may be, were improvements on the instruments they were designed to supersede; and the statutes framed, though necessarily defective because of the crude and varying social and industrial conditions upon which they were based, were more in harmony with the spirit of the age and the genius of our free institutions than the obsolete laws that they supplanted. Nor is there just or any sufficient grounds upon which to charge an oppressive administration of the laws.

The State debt proper is less than a half million dollars and the State taxes are light. Nor can complaint be reasonably made of the judiciary. The records of the supreme judicial tribunal of the State will show, in 1859–'60, 266 decisions in cases of appeal from the lower courts, of which 169 were affirmed and 97 reversed. In 1872–'73 the records show 328 decisions rendered in cases of appeal from below, of which 221 were affirmed and 107 reversed; and in 1876, of appeals from chancellors, appointed by Governor Ames, up to date, 41 decisions have been rendered, of which 33 were affirmed and 8 reversed. This exhibit, whether of legislation or administration, shows there has been no adequate provocation to revolution and no justification for violence in Mississippi. That we should have made mistakes, under the circumstances, in measures of both legislation and administration, was natural, and that we have had any success is both creditable and hopeful.

But if it can be shown that we have used the ballot either to abridge the rights of our fellow-citizens or to oppress them; if it shall appear that we have ever used our newly acquired power as a sword of attack and not as a shield of defense, then we may with some show of propriety be charged with incapacity, dishonesty, or tyranny. But, even then, I submit that the corrective is in the hands of the people, and not of a favored class, and the remedy is in the honest exercise of the ballot, and not in fraud and violence.

Mr. President, do not misunderstand me; I do not hold that all the white people of the State of Mississippi aided and abetted the white-league organizations. There is in Mississippi a large and respectable element among the opposition who are not only honest in their recognition of the political rights of the colored citizen and deprecate the fraud and violence through which those rights have been assailed, but who would be glad to see the color line in politics abandoned and good-will obtain and govern among all classes of her people. But the fact is to be regretted that this better class of citizens in many parts of the State is dominated by a turbulent and violent element of the opposition, known as the White League—a ferocious minority—and has thus far proved powerless to prevent the recurrence of the outrages it deprecates and deplores.

The uses of this investigation are various. It will be important in suggesting such action as may be found necessary not only to correct and repair the wrongs perpetrated, but to prevent their recurrence. But I will venture to assert that the investigation will be most beneficial in this, that it will largely contribute to the formation of a public sentiment that, while it restrains the vicious in their attacks upon the rights of the loyal, law-abiding voters of the South, will so energize the laws as to secure condign punishment to wrong-doers, and give a security to all classes, which will effectively and abundantly produce the mutual good-will and confidence that constitute the foundations of the public prosperity.

We want peace and good order at the South; but it can only come by the fullest recognition of the rights of all classes. The opposition must concede the necessity of change, not only in the temper but in the philosophy of their party organization and management. The sober American judgment must obtain in the South as elsewhere in the Republic, that the only distinctions upon which parties can be safely organized and in harmony with our institutions are differences of opinions relative to principles and policy of government, and that differences of religion, nationality, or race can neither with safety nor propriety be permitted for a moment to enter into the party contests of the day. The unanimity with which the colored voters act with a party is not referable to any race prejudice on their part. On the contrary, they invite the political co-operation of their white brethren, and vote as a unit because proscribed as such. They deprecate the establishment of the color line by the opposition, not only because the act is unwise and wrong in principle, but because it isolates them from the white men of the South, and forces them, in sheer self-protection and against their inclination, to act seemingly upon the basis of a race prejudice that they neither respect nor entertain. As a class they are free from prejudices, and have no uncharitable suspicions against their white fellow-citizens, whether native born or settlers from the Northern States. They not only recognize the equality of citizenship and the right of every man to hold, without proscription, any position of honor and trust to which the confidence of the people may elevate him; but owing nothing to race, birth, or surroundings, they, above all other classes in the community, are interested to see prejudices drop out of both politics and the business of the country, and success in life proceed only upon the integrity and merit of the man who seeks it. They are also appreciative—feeling and exhibiting the liveliest gratitude for counsel and help in their new career, whether they come from the men of the North or of the South. But withal, as they progress in intelligence and appreciation of the dignity of their prerogatives as citizens, they, as an evidence of growth, begin to realize the significance of the proverb, "When thou doest well for thyself, men shall praise thee;" and are disposed to exact the same protection and concession of rights that are conferred upon other citizens by the Constitution, and that, too, without the humiliation involved in the enforced abandonment of their political convictions.

We simply demand the practical recognition of the rights given us in the Constitution and laws, and ask from our white fellow-citizens only the consideration and fairness that we so willingly extend to them. Let them generally realize and concede that citizenship imports to us what it does to them, no more and no less, and impress the colored people that a party defeat does not imperil their political franchise. Let them cease their attempts to coerce our political co-operation, and invite and secure it by a policy so fair and just as to commend itself to our judgment, and resort to no motive or measure to control us that self-respect would preclude their applying to themselves. When we can entertain opinions and select party affiliations without proscription, and cast our ballots as other citizens and without jeopardy to person or privilege, we can safely afford to be governed by the considerations that ordinarily determine the political action of American citizens. But we must be guaranteed in the unproscribed exercise of our honest convictions and be absolutely, from within or without, protected in the use of our ballot before we can either wisely or safely divide our vote. In union, not division, is strength, so long as White League proscription renders division of our vote impracticable by making a difference of opinion opprobrious and an antagonism in politics a crime. On the other hand, if we should, from considerations of fear, yield to the shot-gun policy of our opponents, the White League might win a temporary success, but the ultimate result would be disastrous to both races, for they would first become aggressively turbulent, and we, as a class, would become servile, unreliable, and worthless.

It has been suggested, as the popular sentiment of the country, that the colored citizens must no longer expect special legislation for their benefit, nor exceptional interference by the National Government for their protection. If this is true, if such is the judgment relative to our demands and needs, I venture to offset the suggestion, so far as it may be used as reason for a denial of the protection we seek, by the statement of another and more prevalent popular conviction. Back of this, and underlying the foundations of the Republic itself, there lies deep in the breasts of the patriotic millions of the country the conviction that the laws must be enforced, and life, liberty, and property must, alike to all and for all, be protected. But I allege that we do not seek special action in our behalf, except to meet special danger, and only then such as all classes of citizens are entitled to receive under the Constitution. We do not ask the enactment of new laws, but only the enforcement of those that already exist.

The vicious and exceptional political action had by the White League in Mississippi has been repeated in other contests and in other States of the South, and the colored voters have been subjected therein to outrages upon their rights similar to those perpetrated in my own State at the recent election. Because violence has become so general a quality in the political canvasses of the South and my people the common sufferers in each instance, I have considered this subject more in detail than would, under other circumstances, have been either appropriate or necessary. As the proscription and violence toward the colored voters are special and almost exclusive, and seem to proceed upon the assumption that there is something exceptionally offensive and unworthy in them, I have felt, as the only representative of my race in the Senate of the United States, that I was placed, in some sort, upon the defensive, and I have consequently endeavored to show how aggravated and inexcusable were the wrongs worked upon us, and have sought to vindicate our title to both the respect and good-will of the just people of the nation. The gravity of the issues involved has demanded great plainness of speech from me. But I have endeavored to present my views to the Senate with the moderation and deference inspired by the recollection that both my race and myself were once bondsmen, and are to-day debtors largely to the love and justice of a great people for the enjoyment of our personal and political liberty. While my antecedents and surroundings suggest modesty, there are some considerations that justify frankness, and even boldness of speech.

Mr. President, I represent, in an important sense, the interest of nearly a million of voters, constituting a new, hopeful, permanent, and influential political element, and large enough to affect in critical periods the fortunes of this great Republic; and the public safety and common weal alike demand that the integrity of this element should be preserved and its character improved. They number more than a million of producers, who, since their emancipation and outside of their contributions to the production of sugar, rice, tobacco, cereals, and the mechanical industries of the country, have furnished nearly forty million bales of cotton, which, at the ruling prices of the world's market, have yielded $2,000,000,000, a sum nearly equal to the national debt; producers who, at the accepted ratio that an able-bodied laborer earns, on an average $800 per year, annually bring to the aggregate of the nation's great bulk of values more than $800,000,000.

I have confidence, not only in my country and her institutions, but in the endurance, capacity, and destiny of my people. We will, as opportunity offers and ability serves, seek our places, sometimes in the field of letters, arts, sciences, and the professions. More frequently mechanical pursuits will attract and elicit our efforts; more still of my people will find employment and livelihood as the cultivators of the soil. The bulk of this people—by surroundings, habits, adaptation, and choice—will continue to find their homes in the South, and constitute the masses of its yeomanry. We will there probably, of our own volition and more abundantly than in the past, produce the great staples that will contribute to the basis of foreign exchange, aid in giving the nation a balance of trade, and minister to the wants and comfort and build up the prosperity of the whole land. Whatever our ultimate position in the composite civilization of the Republic and whatever varying fortunes attend our career, we will not forget our instincts for freedom nor our love of country. Guided and guarded by a beneficent Providence, and living under the genial influence of liberal institutions, we have no apprehensions that we shall fail from the land from attrition with other races, or ignobly disappear from either the politics or industries of the country.

Mr. President, allow me here to say that, although many of us are uneducated in the schools, we are informed and advised as to our duties to the Government, our State, and ourselves. Without class prejudice or animosities, with obedience to authority as the lesson and love of peace and order as the passion of our lives, with scrupulous respect for the rights of others, and with the hopefulness of political youth, we are determined that the great Government that gave us liberty, and rendered its gift valuable by giving us the ballot, shall not find us wanting in a sufficient response to any demand that humanity or patriotism may make upon us; and we ask such action as will not only protect us in the enjoyment of our constitutional rights, but will preserve the integrity of our republican institutions.

Mr. KEY. Mr. President, much has been said during this session of Congress in regard to the condition, opinions, and purposes of the people in the Southern States. As yet, little has been said by their immediate representatives on this floor. In this, I think, they have shown most commendable good taste and wise discretion, for they are placed in a situation of great embarrassment which restrains or should restrain hasty and inconsiderate speech and, on many questions, demands of them silence. They do not stand and cannot stand on this floor with equal position and advantage with the representatives of the Northern States. That we feel and know. This does not result from any want of courtesy toward us; for I must say that there is no ground of complaint on that account, but it arises from the peculiarity of our position and that of our constituencies in regard to our late civil strife. I think, however, that the Senate and the country should know something of the nature of our respective views upon the peculiar questions growing out of our present somewhat anomalous conditions. And, sir, I believe, notwithstanding some of the fearful utterance which we heard yesterday in the heat of this debate, that at least some regard will be paid to what we say and some respect to the facts we state. It is a mistaken magnanimity which would permit us seats on this floor and yet allow us to represent nothing but deceit, treason, falsehood, and hypocrisy.

The issues of the late contest between the North and the South were decided, for all time, against the people and States of the South. The South must abide by this decision, and dare not question it. The quarrel was almost as old as the Government and for almost a century had, with increasing intensity, been transmitted from father to son, and could never have been settled in the enfranchisement of the slaves but by a war. The conflict was "irrepressible." It had to be determined by us or by our children. It was a fair trial of strength, and was bravely fought. It is determined, and let us thank Heaven that it is over. The Southern States were not entirely to blame certainly for this unfortunate controversy. Property in slaves existed long before our Government was established. Our Constitution recognized this and threw around slavery guarantees special and peculiar in their character. By it the legal right was given to own slaves and under it remedies were provided for the maintenance of the right. Both sections of the country framed and ratified this Constitution. No man who engaged in the rebellion had introduced slavery into the country or aided in establishing the Constitution. This generation inherited this Constitution and slavery. The South alone became the heir of slavery; to the whole country belonged the Constitution. It would have been far better for the nation, and especially for the South, if slavery had not been provided for in this instrument. One section, finding warrant for it in the organic law and accustomed to slavery all their lives, were educated to believe and did believe that it was right. Its people had been taught so to believe by those who ministered at their altars and by their trusted statesmen. The other section was educated to believe and did believe that slavery was wrong; that it was the sin of the age and a blot most foul upon the character of the nation. It was a war of education and of the ideas resulting from education. It followed necessarily and inevitably that free States sought, by unfriendly legislation, to discourage and weaken slavery, so that its ultimate destruction might be assured. The slave States very naturally, under the circumstances, finding this species of property assailed, undertook to secure their title to it by strong legal enactments. The quarrel grew in intensity and the antagonism between the sections increased until they came to blows. The sword was appealed to to determine the controversy and the justice of the quarrel. The questions put in issue were all decided against the South. Its slaves became freemen and citizens. Their owners are entitled to no compensation for them; debts created in aid of the rebellion are void; the soldiers of the armies in rebellion, having fought against this Government, have no claim and never can have for pensions or other bounties for such service.

A State has no right to secede from the Union. The South has no ground to complain of the loss of what it risked on this result. It must accept, it does accept and abide by the amendments to the Constitution, and the legislation under them, which establish and enforce this determination and result of the conflict. By this decision the people of the South stand. They feel that not only patriotism but honor and manhood demand that they should do so. All that I claim for this people in this regard is that they engaged in the rebellion from motives which were honest, and, while the result establishes beyond contradiction and controversy as a legal fact that the South only was in the wrong, I insist as a moral and historical truth that it was not altogether to blame for the cause of controversy; for if slavery had never existed under our Government this war would never have been waged. The people of the South do not believe that slavery ought to or can again exist. They do not wish it to exist. They have no disposition to deprive the colored people of any of their rights of citizenship or of their free exercise. Trained to look upon the colored man as an inferior, they were reluctant to acknowledge his political equality and opposed conferring upon him the higher rights of citizenship, and loyal as well as disloyal men South agreed in this; but now they submit to be governed by the existing laws upon this subject and do not seek their change. Such, I am sure, is the general sentiment of the southern people with whom I have been brought in contact. Unfortunately for them there are some exceptions to this rule among individuals and communities, and the utterances of these are magnified to the prejudice of all. The colored man has the sympathy of his former master, and deserves it. He was the innocent and harmless cause of the contest. The quarrel was about him, not with him, and he was not a party to it. He knew his feeedom was involved in the struggle, and he desired liberty, yet in most instances he remained true and faithful to his master's fortune and family until a superior force intervening in his favor set him free. He was affectionate, generous, and obedient to the end. Though there were four millions of these people in the slave States yet there was no insurrection, insubordination, or incendiarism. History furnishes no example of such forbearance under like circumstances.

The new relations of the white and colored races toward each other at the close of this revolution were to them so strange, so contrary to their education, habits, and previous ideas, as to lead to mutual distrust. This feeling of distrust is passing away, and as it disappears there is a nearer approach to agreement. In my State, and in others, many colored men are now democrats and vote that ticket—a thing almost unheard of some years ago. The master, in many instances, was sour and sullen at the close of the war, and would not vote with his late slaves. Time and suffering have mellowed his acerbity. He has grown into a better disposition, is taking an interest in public affairs, and now votes in elections, so that republican majorities are often transformed into democratic majorities, not by fraud or intimidation, but because of an improved feeling of patriotism.

The northern States no doubt are impatient under what they conceive to be the tardy progress made by their southern brethren under their new departure. The southern people have much to do to repair their shattered fortunes. The white and colored races are beginning to better appreciate and comprehend their changed relations, and, in consequence, are co-operating more harmoniously. A great societary revolution such as the South has undergone, a revolution which has torn up at once and by the roots the habits, modes of living, and the very thoughts and ideas of the people, demands time, study, experience, and use before there can be an adjustment of the various disturbed, disordered, and scattered elements evolved by it. When the foundations of society have been overturned, time must be allowed its population to accommodate themselves to the change. The South is passing through this process, and it is a difficult one, but it is marching through it manfully, and better than it hoped.

No section of the Union is more interested in the enforcement of the laws than is the South. It is poor and weak. Beaten in the late conflict, it has neither the desire or the ability to resist the authority of the Government. It needs peace. It needs the protection of the law, the security that its enforcement gives. Sir, the South wants repose, peace, fraternity. It is time for us to forget that we have a North or a South. It is time to forget the bitterness of past controversies, remembering only their lessons, so that we may become as undivided in affection as in government. The union of our States is indissoluble; let the hearts of our citizens be knitted together by ties as strong.

The victory over the rebellion was complete. Those who gained this victory have the right to enjoy their triumph, and to exult in their success. I have no fault to find with the terms they gave. They were more liberal and magnanimous, I am free to admit, than I, for one, expected in the event of our defeat. I expected terms would be dictated to us, and hard terms at that. I have no quarrel with the terms given. I want no quarrel about anything. I want an amity that is heartfelt. On the part of the South I desire to see a full and unreserved submission to and acquiescence in the terms imposed. Cannot the North, while condemning our rebellion, sympathize with us under the woes, untold and undefinable, which it has brought upon us, and continue to exercise toward us a magnanimity which, by reason of its magnitude, shall be known as American, surpassing any recorded in history? Let it be of the very highest type, that shown by brave men to brave men under defeat.

Our distinguished President, in his annual message to Congress, in vigorous and truthful language, has called to our minds the glories of our nation's centennial year. Our hearts glow with pride and swell with pleasure as we gaze upon this splendid picture. Sir, shall we not make this centennial year a year of jubilee also, so that a general joy may pervade the land from lakes to gulf and ocean to ocean. Why, sir, God has given us the best country upon the face of the earth. A pure and healthful atmosphere surrounds us. Fertile plains and valleys are spread out before us. All about us are rivers, lakes, and oceans ready to bear our commerce. The earth under our feet is full of the most useful and of the richest minerals. And this magnificent country is peopled by those whose ancestors came, or who have come themselves, from nations which, together with our own, control the destinies of the world. England, the German states, Ireland, Holland, France, and Spain laid the foundations of our population upon which we have builded as never a nation did before. Let us be men and do our duty. Let us lighten the burdens which press upon the shoulders of the people, and give them a fair field and good opportunity for work. Let us encourage them, and not appal them with the hoarse cry of blood, nor paralyze their efforts by magnifying the obstacles which lie in their path. If we shall do these things, if we fail not in our duty, the people will come out of our present difficulties, as they have those in the past, grandly, gloriously. Sir, American genius, industry, energy, and perseverance, properly directed and encouraged, can and will overcome anything which men can subdue and erect anything which men can build.

Mr. President, as I have said already, the South has neither the means nor the ability to resist the authority of the Government. It needs the protection of the law, the security which its enforcement gives. If there have been violations of the law, if colored voters have been prevented from voting by fraud, intimidation, or violence, let the violators of the law be punished. The judiciary of the State of Mississippi, State and Federal, belongs to the party defeated in the late election in that State. If the laws have been so flagrantly broken, why sit these judges idle? For one I say frankly that I have no fear of the proposed investigation so far as its developments may be concerned; but if the facts be as alleged, they ought to be exposed and punished; and for myself, and for myself alone, I speak when I say that I feel it my duty, a most disagreeable duty, too, to vote for this resolution, for in doing so I may be the only member of my party who shall do so. I do not so vote because I believe the investigation is deserved by the people of that State. I am free to say that if I represented a State which had not been in the rebellion, perhaps if I had taken no part in that rebellion myself, I should vote against it. Before Heaven I assert that in my judgment there is no necessity or just occasion for this investigation. On the contrary, I believe it will be productive of no good. These investigations of elections are confined to one section of the country, and that the feeblest one. They are evidence of want of confidence in the people of that section and postpone complete and harmonious reconciliation. But frequently on this floor, and even in this debate, I have heard Senators from northern States who have spoken kind words of the people of the South denounced as greater enemies of the Government than those who engaged in the rebellion, and for no other or better reason which I could discover than that they had some faith in the southern people. If I have offended, if my people have offended, against the laws of the country, I want and my people want no vicarious punishment administered on that account. "Let no guilty man escape," but in God's name punish not the innocent. Sir, we are not believed. Our statements are of no effect. Our testimony is discredited and opposition to this investigation is construed to mean a desire to conceal deeds of infamy.

For one I desire to relieve our friends of all embarrassment on our account; and for that reason and with the hope that the distinguished Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] for both of whom I have very great admiration and respect, will learn from it that the people of the South are not so bad as to them they seem. I deal in no harsh epithets. There is no man anywhere against whom I bear malice, and I can sit with temper unruffled and mind serene and listen to these denunciations; for, while I know that they are unmerited, I know also that these distinguished gentlemen believe them deserved, or they would not utter them. They are hardly competent jurors, in the eye of the law, to try the people of the South, as they have not only formed but expressed an opinion against our innocence. Still, for one, I am willing to waive their incompetency, and let them try us, find us guilty if they want to, and hang us if they will, and then I trust that the country and the women and children of the South will have peace. Let every man whose misfortune it was to own a slave be punished with death, and that may end the cry of slave aristocracy. Invite not such to your approaching Centennial, for there is no hope for them here or hereafter, and their presence would destroy the joy of my distinguished friends on that occasion, and of that great multitude who shall follow them to the glorious triumph they declare they must obtain in the November elections. If what they say be true, there is no joy in the centennial year for the Southern States, and they would be unwelcome guests at the feast which shall celebrate it.

The Senator from Indiana refers, or has referred heretofore, to the majorities given in the various elections in Mississippi for the last few years as evidence of fraud and intimidation. He tells us that in 1869 the republicans gave 76,186 and the democrats 38,097 votes; that in 1872 the republicans gave 82,175 and the democrats 47,288; that in 1873 the republicans gave 73,662 and the democrats 44,286 votes; and that in 1875 the republicans gave 66,659 and the democrats 96,906 votes, and from this great revolution in majorities we are to infer that fraud and intimidation were used to produce it. This is certainly quite a change, but do not such changes frequently occur in other States? The democrats were never charged with carrying Massachusetts by fraud and intimidation, and how has it voted? In 1868 the republicans cast 136,477 and the democrats 59,408 votes, a republican majority of 77,069; in 1872 the republicans gave 133,472 and the democrats 59,260 votes, a republican majority of 74,212 votes; and yet in 1874 the republicans gave 89,344 and the democrats 96,376 votes, a democratic majority of 7,032 votes. The change in Mississippi in 1873 and 1875 between the majorities was 59,623 votes, and in Massachusetts from 1872 to 1874 was 81,244 votes, that is, greater by more than 21,000 votes than in Mississippi, and yet no one proposed to investigate the Massachusetts election. Other examples might be given. This shows that though such transformations are remarkable, they are not so uncommon as to be very marvelous.

But, sir, the distinguished Senator from Indiana, for whom, as I have said, I have much admiration and great respect, lives at a distance from this "sea of troubles." He "looks through a glass darkly" at the people of the Southern States. With him all presumptions are against this people. His resolution, as shown on its face, is predicated on mere allegation. He acts in this matter, as he frankly tells us, upon information derived from "documents, affidavits, and statements," some of which are of an "official character." Yes, sir, "there's the rub." Like the Babylonian king, the officials of the State of Mississippi, who have long rioted in the oppression of her people, see the handwriting on the wall, and their knees do smite together. Their kingdom is divided. They have been weighed in the balance and found wanting, and sinking beneath the waves their madness has raised, they reach out their hands stained and blackened with extortion and oppression and crime and cry to the Senator from Indiana for help. The colored people of the State are not alarmed. It is those whose glory of official station has gone, and who are too proud to work and are ashamed to beg, and have fallen so low in the public estimation that the colored people whom they have duped no longer give them countenance or do them reverence.

And now, sir, permit me to say that in the war of words which has followed the battles of the rebellion I believe there is much of blame to be attached to some of our southern orators and southern newspapers. Many things have been said by them calculated to provoke retort and recrimination, and to make such response, in many cases, justifiable. That southern man who, failing to appreciate the results of the late bloody contest, and to recognize the rights which victory gives in such a case, stirs in the hearts of his people the fires of hate or disloyalty, is a much worse enemy of his section and of his people than he who rails at them from a northern stand-point. He holds out to them hopes which must be dashed to pieces, teaches opinions which bring with them unmixed evil, and excites discord and dissatisfaction which bring only disappointment and distress. It is more necessary that there should be, in this time of the South's trial and peril, no provocation on the part of her people and her representatives than it has ever been. Southern effort should be directed to heal the gaping wounds and not to re-open them, and the man of the South who forgets his high and discreet duty in this respect does more injury to the interests of his people and to their peace, prosperity, and happiness than any northern man can do. He furnishes those opposed to him their most effective means of war, for which he is without justification or excuse.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I do not propose to go over the entire field of this debate, but merely in the briefest possible manner to answer some of the legal objections urged by the Senator from Delaware, for whose legal opinions when he coolly and dispassionately examines a subject I have always entertained a very high respect and whose patriotism I never doubted, for, though we may disagree in our opinions upon many questions of law and of policy, I accord to him the same purity of motive by which I claim to be actuated. But I think he is entirely mistaken in supposing that there is any force in the objection he makes to the competency of the Senate to institute any inquiry it may see fit to ascertain whether any and what legislation may be required upon any subject whatever within the constitutional power of Congress to legislate upon. Each House must of necessity be at liberty to adopt its own mode of obtaining information upon such questions. How often, for instance, have the Judiciary Committees of each House, separately, been directed by resolution to inquire whether any and what legislation was necessary upon a particular subject? And if that committee may be directed so to inquire, is it any less competent to direct a special committee, raised for the very purpose, to make the like inquiry? I am satisfied the Senator, upon reflection, will yield this objection as wholly untenable.

The next objection, if I understood him correctly, was that such an inquiry and any legislation to be founded upon it were an improper interference with the rights of the States, by which he must mean either that it was an improper interference under the Constitution as it was before the amendment or that the fifteenth amendment was invalid, which expressly gives to Congress the power to enforce it by the appropriate legislation; and, if I understood him correctly, he holds (and claims that such is the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the case from Kentucky) that Congress have no power to adopt any legislation at all for carrying that amendment into effect, for, as I understood his construction of that decision, it was to the effect that the Federal Government was only authorized by that amendment to see that no legislation of any State should disfranchise or prevent from voting any person on account of race, or color, or previous condition of servitude, or which should make a discrimination on this ground. If this were so then the judiciary of the Federal Government alone would have the right to exercise any power under the fifteenth amendment. But unfortunately the language of that amendment knocks out the very teeth of such an argument; for, while it is silent as to the judiciary it expressly provides that "Congress shall have power to enforce the article," and Congress can only enforce it by legislation, and not judicially. So that the result of this argument of the Senator, and his construction of the decision of the Supreme Court in this Kentucky case, is, when reduced to its final analysis, that the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution is unconstitutional.

It may be that the Senator's ingenuity may enable him to escape this absurd conclusion from his argument, but he has yet shown us no mode of escape from it.

Mr. President, the substitute which I had the honor of presenting was prepared last December and so also were the remarks which I made here the other day upon its presentation, and though I was neither "a prophet nor the son of a prophet," and was not even aware of the pendency in the Supreme Court of this Kentucky case or the Louisiana case just decided—which happened to be decided on the very day I submitted my substitute, and of which I only heard the next day—I could not, if I had already seen the decision in the Kentucky case and prepared my substitute with reference to it, have more accurately placed it upon the true ground of that decision, nor more clearly have shown the propriety and necessity of the proposed inquiry than their propriety and necessity have now been demonstrated by that decision.

And now, Mr. President, having examined a little more carefully, that decision since the argument of the Senator last evening, the Senator from Delaware will permit me frankly to say that, unless I am wholly incapable of understanding the language in which that decision is expressed, he has wholly misapprehended its meaning, its effect, and its scope. And I propose to show by the decision itself, in connection with the very few comments I shall make upon it, that it fully admits the power of Congress to prohibit and make penal the very acts charged in the indictment and any and all other acts calculated and intended to prevent any colored man from voting on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, provided the acts of Congress prohibiting and punishing such acts shall confine its operation to acts and omissions calculated or intended to prevent the exercise of the elective franchise on the special ground of "race, color, or previous condition of servitude."

The question, it is true, is a nice one, and it requires some care and attention to understand exactly the meaning and intent of the decision; but, with that care and attention, and a careful examination of the act of Congress under which the case arose, its meaning and effect seem to me to be very clear.

The ground of the decision in the Kentucky case is that the provisions of the law under which the indictment was found did not limit the offense to the cases provided for by the fifteenth amendment, namely, acts done to prevent persons from voting "on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude," but was general, applying to all citizens, and imposing the penalty for any act preventing any citizen from voting for any cause, or that the sections under which the indictment was framed related to acts done or required to be done anterior to the offering of the vote. But, as I understand the decision upon a mere cursory examination, without taking time carefully to analyze and test the whole, as I would like to do, I think it fully admits "the power of Congress to punish the very acts complained of, if Congress had appropriately made the offense consist of the doing of those acts for the purpose of depriving, and with the intent to deprive, any person of his vote on account of his race or color or previous condition of servitude," this being the only ground under the fifteenth amendment upon which such prevention can be rendered criminal. And the power of Congress to render this criminal, and to punish it, is, it seems to me, distinctly admitted throughout the opinion. And, if I am right in this view of the decision, I think the court were right, to this extent at least; and I am not yet ready to say that after a careful study of the opinion I might not agree with the entire opinion of the court, though at present, but for this decision, I might have been inclined to say that the principle up to this time, I think, almost always admitted in the construction of a statute upon the question of its constitutionality would have saved the act by limiting it to a constitutional construction. This principle is that where an act is susceptible of two constructions, one of which would be warranted by the Constitution and the other prohibited by it, the Legislature shall be presumed to have intended the provision to be understood in the sense authorized by the Constitution rather than in the sense which would violate its provisions, which the legislators were sworn to support; in other words, that an act of Congress and its framers, when arraigned for a violation of the Constitution, are entitled at least to the same favorable presumption of innocence as an ordinary criminal on trial for a crime, and should be presumed innocent until proved to be guilty. I am not entirely sure that I may not finally come to the conclusion that this presumption of innocence in favor of the Congress who passed the act has not been violated or reversed by the construction of the statute adopted by the court; but as yet my respect for that court forbids my drawing this conclusion without a more thorough examination. I know how easy it is upon a hasty reading to draw erroneous conclusions from a judicial opinion; and I have as much confidence in the ability, the integrity, and fidelity of that court as in any now sitting or which ever sat here or elsewhere; though being composed of men, they may like other men err, and we must bow to their errors till they see fit to correct them. But upon the question whether Congress can under the fifteenth amendment make any act tending to prevent a citizen from exercising the elective franchise, except when that act is proposed for the purpose or with the intent to keep up a discrimination between colored and white citizens—in other words, for the purpose of excluding the vote on the ground of color or previous condition of servitude—I entirely concur with the court.

Mr. President, I propose to take up, after these few preliminary remarks, the decision itself, and to show that by the reading of it, in the light of the remarks which I have made here, those remarks are entirely justified. The court proceed in this way:

In this court the United States abandon the first and third counts, and expressly waive the consideration of all claims not arising out of the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution.

After this concession—

Say the court—

the principal question left for consideration is, whether the act under which the indictment is found can be made effective for the punishment of inspectors of elections who refuse to receive and count the votes of citizens of the United States, having all the qualifications of voters, because of their race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Whether that can be done under this act.

If Congress has not declared an act done within a State to be a crime against the United States, the courts have no power to treat it as such. (United States vs. Hudson, 7 Cranch, 32.) It is not claimed that there is any statute which can reach this case, unless it be the one in question.

They proceed to analyze this statute:

Looking, then, to this statute, we find that its first section provides that all citizens of the United States who are or shall be otherwise qualified by law to vote at any election, &c., shall be entitled and allowed to vote thereat, without distinction of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, any constitution, &c., of the State to the contrary notwithstanding.

This—

simply declares a right, without providing a punishment for its violation.

It will be noticed that this section was limited to the very purpose of protecting voters against discrimination on account of race and color. The race-and-color clause was made the distinctive point in the first section. They refer to that afterward, and discuss the question whether that limitation applies to an inspector of election.

They finally hold that it does not:

The second section provides for the punishment of any officer, charged with the duty of furnishing to citizens an opportunity to perform any act which by the constitution or laws of any State is made a prerequisite or qualification of voting, who shall omit to give all citizens of the United States the same and equal opportunity to perform such prerequisite and become qualified on account of the race, color, or previous condition of servitude of the applicant.

This section was limited by the race-and-color count, but the difficulty was, as the court point out immediately, that it did not extend to the act of voting at all, and therefore did not apply to the case they had in hand, which was against one of the inspectors of the election.

This—

The court say—

does not apply to or include the inspectors of an election, whose only duty it is to receive and count the votes of citizens designated by law as voters, who have already become qualified to vote at the election.

It referred only to an act previous to that time, and therefore they could not punish him for that. The questions that arise all turn upon the third and fourth sections of the act which are set out.

The third section is to the effect that whenever, by or under the constitution or laws of any State, &c., any act is or shall be required to be done by any citizen as a prerequisite to qualify or entitle him to vote, the offer of such citizen to perform the act required to be done, "as aforesaid," shall, if it fail to be carried into execution by reason of the wrongful act or omission "aforesaid" of the person or officer charged with the duty of receiving or permitting such performance or offer to perform, or acting thereon, be deemed and held as a performance in law of such act; and the person so offering and failing as aforesaid, and being otherwise qualified, shall be entitled to vote in the same manner and to the same extent as if he had in fact performed such act; and any judge, inspector, or other officer of election, whose duty it is to receive, count, &c., or give effect to the vote of any such citizen, who shall wrongfully refuse or omit to receive, count, &c., the vote of such citizen, upon the presentation by him of his affidavit stating such offer, and the time and place thereof, and the name of the person or officer whose duty it was to act thereon, and that he was wrongfully prevented by such person or officer from performing such act, shall for every such offense forfeit and pay, &c.

Here comes now the real objection to the act, which the court point out. It is not limited at all by the purpose required by the fifteenth amendment, but applies to all citizens everywhere, to any interference with their rights, not because they may be white or black, but on any ground whatever: that all should be permitted to vote. That is the objection which the court make to this act.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Six words would have made it all right,

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Again:

The fourth section provides for the punishment of any person who shall, by force, bribery, threats, intimidation, or other unlawful means, hinder, delay, &c., or shall combine with others to hinder, delay, prevent, or obstruct, any citizen from doing any act required to be done to qualify him to vote or from voting at any election.

There is the same objection again. It is not confined to the purposes of the fifteenth amendment, but it is general, usurping in fact or attempting to usurp powers that properly belong to the State. In that I fully agree with the court. I see nothing to complain of on that point, if this could not have been met by construction and be limited by the first section, which it seems to me might have been done by a little ingenuity at least. The court proceed:

The second count in the indictment is based upon the fourth section of this act and the fourth upon the third section.

Rights and immunities created by or dependent upon the Constitution of the United States can be protected by Congress. The form and the manner of the protection may be such as Congress, in the legitimate exercise of its legislative discretion, shall provide. These may be varied to meet the necessities of the particular right to be protected.

The fifteenth amendment does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one.

Upon that I wish to make a remark here. The meaning of the court, from what follows, evidently is that it does not directly do it:

It prevents the States or the United States, however, from giving preference, in this particular, to one citizen of the United States over another on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. Before its adoption this could be done. It was as much within the power of a State to exclude citizens of the United States from voting on account of race, &c., as it was on account of age, property, or education. Now it is not. If citizens of one race having certain qualifications are permitted by law to vote, those of another having the same qualifications must be. Previous to this amendment there was no constitutional guarantee against this discrimination. Now there is.

See what follows:

It follows that the amendment has invested the citizens of the United States with a new constitutional right which is within the protecting power of Congress.

I see no reason for any misapprehension in that.

That right is exemption from discrimination in the exercise of the elective franchise on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude This, under the express provisions of the second section of the amendment, Congress may enforce by "appropriate legislation."

This leads us to inquire whether the act now under consideration is "appropriate legislation" for that purpose. The power of Congress to legislate at all upon the subject of voting at State elections rests upon this amendment. The effect of article 1, section 4, of the Constitution in respect to elections for Senators and Representatives is not now under consideration.

Of course they therefore say nothing upon that.

It has not been contended, nor can it be, that the amendment confers authority to impose penalties for every wrongful refusal to receive the vote of a qualified elector at State elections.

Of course it does not.

It is only when the wrongful refusal at such an election is because of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, that Congress can interfere and provide for its punishment. If, therefore, the third and fourth sections of the act are beyond that limit, they are unauthorized.

They are clearly beyond that limit, for they are not limited by the first section, because the phrase is not used in them which is used in the fifteenth amendment.

The third section—

Now they are discussing the question whether this can be limited by the third section—

The third section does not in express terms limit the offense of an inspector of elections, for which the punishment is provided, to a wrongful discrimination on account of race, &c.

The act provided for punishing him, but did not provide for punishing him for the only offense he could commit under this constitutional amendment. That is all.

This is conceded, but it is urged, that when this section is construed with those which precede it, and to which, as is claimed, it refers, it is so limited. The argument is that the only wrongful act on the part of the officer whose duty it is to receive or permit the requisite qualification, which can dispense with actual qualification under the State laws, and substitute the prescribed affidavit therefor, is that mentioned and prohibited in section 2, to wit, discrimination on account of race, &c., and that consequently section 3 is confined in its operation to the same wrongful discrimination.

We now ought to have a close and strict construction.

This is a penal statute and must be construed strictly; not so strictly, indeed, as to defeat the clear intention of Congress, but the words employed must be understood in the sense they were obviously used. (United States vs. Wiltberger, 5 Wheaton, 85.) If, taking the whole statute together, it is apparent that it was not the intention of Congress thus to limit the operation of the act, we cannot give it that effect.

The statute contemplates a most important change in the election laws. Previous to its adoption, the States, as a general rule, regulated in their own way all the details of all elections. They prescribed the qualifications of voters and the manner in which those offering to vote at an election should make known their qualifications to the officers in charge. This act interferes with this practice and prescribes rules not provided by the laws of the States. It substitutes, under certain circumstances, performance wrongfully prevented for performance itself. If the elector makes and presents his affidavit in the form and to the effect prescribed, the inspectors are to treat this as the equivalent of the specified requirement of the State law. This is a radical change in the practice, and the statute which creates it should be explicit in its terms. Nothing should be left to construction if it can be avoided. The law ought not to be in such a condition that the elector may act upon one idea of its meaning and the inspector upon another.

And so through the whole opinion, as I understand the language—and it seems to me to be expressed in very plain English—the power is distinctly and fully admitted to cover the entire field of legislation intended by the fifteenth amendment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him a moment? I am very much interested in his argument; and before he passes from this subject, I wish to ask him a question, which I will put after I call his attention particularly to the first section of the fifteenth amendment. The language of the fifteenth amendment is in these words:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State—on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

That is a material word to my question—

There are three causes for which the State cannot make a discrimination. The question I wish to put to my honorable friend now is this: In the case of Mississippi their constitution and their law, as I understand, comply exactly with this provision of the Constitution. There is no discrimination on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude touching suffrage. The State, therefore, has complied with the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States in that respect. Now suppose that John Smith and William Jones and many other evil-disposed citizens in Mississippi shall undertake to deprive half a dozen colored citizens of their right to vote, can the Congress of the United States pass an act to punish those citizens for thus interfering with the rights of colored men? That is the question I put.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am ready to answer the question. I have made but a slight examination and was commenting entirely on this opinion; but I say that, in my judgment, Congress has the very power to which the Senator from North Carolina refers, and I say that, without thus holding, that provision, authorizing Congress to adopt the appropriate legislation, is the sheerest nonsense—empty words and nothing else; because, as I have just demonstrated, the construction suggested by the Senator leads to the conclusion that it is only the Federal judiciary of the United States which can exercise any power under the fifteenth amendment, whereas that amendment provides specially that Congress shall have power to adopt appropriate legislation. Under the other idea suggested by the Senator, what appropriate legislation could be adopted? None whatever. That is, I hope, sufficient on that point.

But, Mr. President, I only intended to say enough to disabuse the minds of some Senators, I think, on both sides, as to what is the real tenor and effect of that decision of the Supreme Court; that, so far from its standing in the way of the inquiry which we seek to make here, it shows the very best ground in the world why that inquiry should be made.

JAIL ON JUDICIARY SQUARE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, I have received a communication from the District commissioners which shows that some legislative action ought to take place to-day; and I have the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to bring the matter before the Senate now. I report a bill by consent of the members of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

The bill (S. No. 682) to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, and for other purposes, was read the first time. It directs the Chief Engineer of the Army to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, in the city of Washington, and to turn the same over to the use of the authorities of the District temporarily, or until other jail facilities are provided; and makes it lawful for the courts of the District of Columbia to confine prisoners therein.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I will merely say that it was expected that when the new jail was completed there would be sufficient accommodation for both the United States and the District of Columbia. But it is found that the capacity of the new jail is limited to two hundred and seventy-two cells, each for a single person, and they now have there two hundred and eighty-nine. The sale that is spoken of in the bill is provided for under an existing law of June, 1874, and must take place, unless it is stopped, on Tuesday next, the 4th of April. So that the District police court will be entirely deprived of any place to send their prisoners. They have temporarily used what is called the Washington Asylum for the purpose of confining malefactors, and also as a work-house for those guilty of minor offenses. But that building is already overloaded. At one time during the present month there were in it two hundred and fifteen poor and two hundred and nineteen prisoners. It would seem, therefore, indispensable that the old jail building should be allowed to remain until some other suitable accommodation can be obtained. I suppose that there will not be a dissenting voice to the passage of the bill, which merely suspends temporarily the sale.

The bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WRIGHT. I suggest to my friend that the concluding part of the bill would be better if he would provide that the courts of the District of Columbia shall have power to order the confinement of prisoners therein. As it is now it seems as if the court itself confined prisoners therein, whereas I suppose it means that they shall have power to order their confinement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection to the amendment, but I believe under existing laws they have that power.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that; but the language of this bill seems now to provide that the courts shall confine them, whereas it perhaps means that they shall have power to order their confinement.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I have no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to amend the bill so as to make the last clause read:

And that it shall be lawful for the courts of the said District of Columbia to order the confinement of prisoners therein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 522) to define the tax on fermented or malt liquors;

A bill (H. R. No. 1344) directing method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from Navy Department;

A bill (H. R. No. 1585) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to designate and fix the points at which collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall hold their offices;

A bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra;

A bill (H. R. No. 2951) to provide for the separate entry of express packages contained in one importation; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department, and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2143) for the sale of the arsenal and lot at Stonington, Connecticut.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 595) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut;

A bill (H. R. No. 356) concerning cases in bankruptcy commenced in the supreme courts of the several Territories prior to the 22d day of June, 1874, and now undetermined therein;

A bill (H. R. No. 1343) to relieve S. J. Gholson, of Mississippi, of political disabilities imposed by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution;

A bill (H. R. No. 2589) to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for certain Indians;

A bill (H. R. No. 2821) to supply a deficiency in the appropriation for the manufacture of postal cards for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 86) for relief of Turtle Mountain band of Chippewa Indians.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution in regard to the appointment of a committee of five Senators to investigate alleged frauds in the late election in the State of Mississippi for members of Congress, members of the Legislature, and State officers.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I move to strike out in the second line of the preamble the words "and State officers and members of the Legislature."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I propose to trouble the Senate with but a very few remarks upon the amendment which I have offered to the preamble to this resolution. I admit that Congress, or either branch of Congress, has power to raise a committee to obtain information touching any matter of legislation that comes within the purview of its jurisdiction. For example, Congress has power to pass a revenue law and to establish a revenue system. We have an internal-revenue system at this moment. It is competent, in some conditions of the country it might be very important, that the Senate should raise a committee and send it out into the country with a view to see how that system operates, to learn its advantages and defects, and whether or not a new system ought to be adopted by Congress in substitution for it, or whether it ought to be modified or amended. And many such examples might be given. I will advert to one or two others.

By the Constitution Congress has jurisdiction to pass laws regulating the manner of holding the elections for members of Congress in every respect. The clause of the Constitution to which I refer is in these words:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations except as to the places of choosing Senators.

So that the whole subject of that election is within the jurisdiction of Congress. And if a proper case were presented requiring an inquiry as to how a particular law of Congress regulating the election of members of Congress operates, whether well or ill, it would be competent for Congress to send out a committee to gather information on that subject in order that the judgment of Congress might be informed as to whether some modification of the existing law or the substitution of some new law were necessary. I say a case might possibly exist in which it would be proper to raise such a committee—it might possibly be necessary.

So I admit that Congress, wherever it has jurisdiction of a subject, has a right to raise a committee to take all necessary steps to inform its judgment by gathering proper information, and in the State of Mississippi as well as in the State of Massachusetts or California or North Carolina, or anywhere else within the limits of the Union.

This resolution, however, in my judgment, does not pretend that there is any necessity for gathering information for the purpose of informing the judgment of Congress touching the enactment of a law regulating congressional elections or touching the passage of an internal-revenue law or the formation of an internal-revenue system, or any other thing that comes within the jurisdiction and power of Congress.

It is sought by the distinguished and venerable Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] to avoid this difficulty by suggesting that in the State of Mississippi great irregularities have prevailed in the elections there and particularly the election of 1875, and that fraud and intimidation and bribery were practiced to a great extent, as is alleged, and more particularly with the view—for he saw the point and saw the difficulty—to give the Senate jurisdiction to raise this committee, he has inserted these words:

And especially that the colored voters, on account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting or compelled to vote contrary to their wishes for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed.

That Senator believed that these words or words tantamount to them were essential in order to give the Senate jurisdiction to raise this committee; they were inserted to bring this case within the purview of the three last amendments to the Constitution. Now, sir, with great deference to his opinion and great respect for him as a Senator, I must be permitted to venture to dissent from the construction which he has put upon the fifteenth amendment. I maintain, with all due respect to all who contend otherwise, that the construction which he has contended for and which he gave in words when I propounded the question to him a few moments ago cannot be sustained by any fair construction of the words used in the fifteenth amendment, or by reason, or by inference; and I maintain furthermore that there is no decision of any court in this country giving that amendment such a construction as he assigns to it. The fifteenth amendment is in these words:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

In the first place let us consider who is to be affected by this fifteenth amendment. It is plain the person is to be a citizen of the United States. But that necessarily implies more than that he must be a citizen of a State as well, because by virtue of being a citizen of the United States he is a citizen of the State wherever he may be, and that by virtue of the fourteenth amendment. His right wherever he may be shall not be denied by the State for any of three reasons, to wit, because of his color, because of his race, because of his previous condition of servitude. For any other cause a State may make a discrimination against him. It may discriminate, as it does, I believe, in the State of Connecticut, and perhaps also in the State of Massachusetts, because the citizen has not capacity or information whereby he can read or write, or because he cannot read the Constitution of the United States or the State within which he resides, or by reason of want of property, or by reason of any other consideration whatsoever in the discretion of the State, except the three causes just mentioned.

The right of a citizen of the United States and of any one of the several States—because he is a citizen of the United States by virtue of his citizenship in a State—to vote in the State shall not be denied or abridged upon any one of these three accounts; but be denied or abridged by whom? That is the material question. The amendment provides that such right "shall not be abridged by the United States." That is, first, Congress can pass no law which prohibits a citizen of the United States from voting in any one of the several States. And therefore if Congress should undertake to pass a law providing that colored men, citizens of the United States in the State of North Carolina, should not be entitled to vote there, such a law would be absolutely null and void, and by virtue of the express provision of the Constitution as contained in the fifteenth amendment. But it provides further that this right shall not be denied or abridged by any State. Now what is the State? Can anybody doubt what is meant in the Constitution by the word State? It manifestly necessarily means one of those organized political bodies that make up the constituent parts of the Union; one of those political organizations which are what we commonly call State governments—a government consisting of executive, legislative, and judicial co-ordinate departments; the State of North Carolina, for example, or the State of Massachusetts, or the State of New York. That is what is meant by "the State," and wherever the term "State" is used in the Constitution it implies just one of those bodies, no more and no less. I cannot conceive of any case where the term "State" is used, when it is used in a sense otherwise than that which I have assigned to it.

If that is true, then this amendment provides, secondly, that no State, no one of the political organizations making up the Union—making a constituent part of it—shall by its legislative authority or in any other authoritative way as a State pass any law or ordinance or do anything, by its convention, through its Legislature, through its judiciary, or through any one of its officers, which shall abridge the right of any man to vote at its elections because of his color, because of his race, or because of his previous condition of servitude.

In order to give this amendment such construction as will confer on the Senate jurisdiction to raise the committee for the cause assigned in the preamble to the resolution under consideration, it is necessary to construe the word "State" there as applying to individuals—natural persons; which it seems to me, with all respect to everybody who contends otherwise, is an absurdity. How the word "State" can be construed to apply to John Smith, John Jones, A B, and C D, is something I cannot comprehend. It is beyond my comprehension, and I never heard it seriously contended before.

Therefore I say that if North Carolina shall provide by her constitution, or by legislative enactment, that no one entitled to vote in that State shall be denied the right to vote on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, that State will have, in that case, complied with the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, and the legislation of that State, either by its constitution or by its legislative enactment, would in such a case be in entire harmony, so far as that goes, with the Constitution of the United States.

Suppose, in the case of Mississippi, for that is the State now under consideration, that the constitution—and I understand such is the fact—there provides that there shall be no discrimination in the manner of voting on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, then the State is in harmony with this provision of the Federal Constitution. Suppose, however, that the State had passed a law—suppose that the constitution of that State provided, or that an act of assembly provided, there being no provision in the constitution upon the subject, that no colored man because of his color or race should be allowed to vote, or that no man who had been a slave because he had been a slave should be allowed to vote, that would be a clear violation of the fifteenth amendment. But how it can be construed or seriously contended that if one or more evil-disposed persons of that State shall undertake to deprive a colored man of his right to vote because of his color or race, after the State law or the State constitution has provided and guaranteed that right under the Constitution of the United States, that Congress in such a case may pass a law to protect him in that respect I cannot understand. That is plainly a right protected by the State law, and Congress has no right or power to extend protection.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] yesterday saw this difficulty, and he undertook to avoid it by saying that this right was protected by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution. He seemed to concede by his argument—and I paid attention to it—that although it could not be protected by legislation under the fifteenth amendment without putting this absurd construction on the word "State," still it was protected by the fourteenth amendment, and therefore Congress had power to raise the proposed committee and inquiry. The argument that has been offered to support the construction placed upon the fifteenth amendment by the distinguished Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] is that, unless the construction is given to the word "State" that it applies to citizens, natural persons, interfering with the right to vote because of race, color, &c., the second section of the fifteenth amendment is meaningless—answers no purpose. It goes upon the idea that that second section is inoperative and void and absurd unless you give the word "State" in the first section the construction that is contended for by him. I say non sequitur. No such consequence follows at all; because, if a State should pass a law prohibiting any one from voting on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude, it would be competent for Congress to pass an act providing that every officer holding an election in that State should receive such a vote; and that, it seems to me, is the way and the only way Congress should legislate to give the fifteenth amendment operative affect. There is no reason why you should resort to the absurd construction of requiring the word "State" to mean "persons or citizens" in order to make the second section of the fifteenth amendment operative; because it would be competent for Congress now to pass a general law that would operate on all the States providing that if any State should declare, by statute or otherwise, that a negro, because of his race, should not vote, or because he had been a slave, should not vote, all the officers essential in conducting the elections in that State should receive the negro's vote, should receive the freedman's vote. And I think I may say, that such an act is the act which the Supreme Court suggests, though not in terms, as necessary to effectuate the purpose of the fifteenth amendment; and I do maintain that no other logical view of this subject can be taken, whether you refer to the words of the amendment, or whether you resort to the ordinary rules of construing constitutions, or whether you resort to fair inference and deduction.

This subject is, indeed, important. It is one that we cannot consider too much, and one which we cannot become too familiar with; and therefore I beg to repeat the view which I have endeavored to make plain. I say that in the fifteenth amendment the terms "or by any State" cannot be construed to mean any other thing than one of the several States of the Union in its corporate capacity; that the phrase cannot receive the construction that it means "citizen" or "natural person;" and I say, furthermore, that the power of Congress consists in its power, under the second section of the fifteenth amendment, to pass a general law, and perhaps it ought to be done, providing in terms that if any State shall provide that any citizen of the United States shall not be allowed to vote because of his race, because of his color, or because of his previous condition of servitude, the officers of the several States required by the laws of those States to hold the election shall be required to receive every such vote, being otherwise lawful, which shall be tendered at proper places and times. That, I think, is the legislation which Congress can do in this behalf, and it can do no other. In that way it provides by appropriate legislation for the enforcement of the fifteenth amendment, and thus both sections of that amendment may become operative and useful. But for the second section, Congress could not probably pass such an act as I have suggested.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator from North Carolina allow me to ask a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Would not that be making the legislation of Congress operate on the individuals just as in the other case?

Mr. MERRIMON. It would be making the law of Congress operate on the individual officers of the State, certainly not on the citizen as a citizen merely; and if any one should interfere to prevent a freedman from voting, he would be amenable to the jurisdiction of the several States—not to that of the United States—for thus having deprived a lawful voter of his lawful right. If you take that view, it is consistent, it is logical, and the whole Constitution harmonizes, and the fifteenth amendment has complete and lawful and logical and reasonable sense; and it seems to me, with all respect, that to give it any other construction is to treat it as containing the absurd provision that "State" means natural person or individual.

The Senator from New Jersey yesterday, as I said a moment ago, seeing this difficulty in his way I have no doubt, insisted that he had a right under the fourteenth amendment, in connection with the subject of voting, that Congress was bound by proper laws to protect, and I beg leave to advert to that subject for a moment or two. So much of the fourteenth amendment as is necessary for my purpose is in these words:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

That is the first clause, and it does what was not done in terms in the Constitution before the adoption of this amendment; it expressly defines who is a citizen of the United States. It goes further than that. It provides that any one who is a citizen of the United States shall be a citizen of the State where he shall reside. That is the purpose of that section, and it would seem to be the sole purpose, and there is no difficulty in construing it. The next clause is the more difficult one. It is the one upon which the Senator to whom I last alluded seemed to rest his argument. It is in these words:

> No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States—

Not citizens of the United States or of any State, but citizens of the United States—

> nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

The ground-work of the Senator's argument is that a citizen of the State is a citizen of the United States; that the citizen of the State has a right to vote, and therefore the United States have jurisdiction and authority to guarantee to him that right. The Senator goes upon the idea that the citizenship of the United States and of the State are identical, that they are one for that purpose, and in this clause they are protected as one. I insist that that is not so. To be a citizen of the United States is one thing, and he has certain rights, benefits, and advantages as a citizen of the United States that are not essential to him as a citizen of the State. To be a citizen of the State is another thing, and he has a different and a much larger class of rights invested in him by virtue of his citizenship as a citizen of the State than he has as a citizen of the United States. This clause of the amendment to the Constitution provides in terms that his privileges and his immunities as a citizen of the United States shall be protected by the United States; but there is no provision in it which provides by terms, or even possible inference, that his privileges and immunities as a citizen of a State shall be so protected; nor can these words be strained and distorted into meaning to say that his rights and privileges and immunities as a citizen of a State shall be so protected by the United States.

This, it seems to me, conforms to the proper and reasonable construction of the language used in the fourteenth amendment; but I am not left to grope my way in the dark upon this subject. The Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases has given a construction to this very clause and settled it, it seems to me, as clearly as a question arising upon any clause of the Constitution could be settled. The purpose of these amendments to the Constitution, that is the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth, was mainly that of freeing the negro race from slavery in this country, every one held to bondage, and putting him upon an exact civil equality with every other citizen of the country. That was the grand leading purpose. The thirteenth amendment simply freed the negro and placed him exactly where the decision of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case placed a free negro. It did not invest him with citizenship. He was no better off than a foreigner who had landed on our shores. By virtue of the thirteenth amendment he had no right to vote. He could exercise very few rights. He was in a very poor and deplorable condition, and hence it became necessary to pass the fourteenth amendment investing him with the rights of citizenship, the rights of citizenship as a citizen of the United States, the rights of citizenship in the State where he might happen to reside. This was the leading purpose of these amendments. I believe I can venture to say that, except as is provided in the fifteenth amendment, no other purpose was effected by the three amendments to the Constitution, that is the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments. Their object was to make all men in this country free and equal, to establish universal civil equality among men; not political, for there is a wide difference between civil and political equality. The right to vote or hold office is not a civil, but a political right. By virtue of this clause a man has civil rights, but by virtue of the Constitution of the United States a man has not the political right of suffrage. The Constitution of the United States knows nothing of suffrage for the purpose of conferring it on any one. Anterior to the fifteenth amendment Congress had no power to confer suffrage upon any human being. It did not pertain to the United States at all to confer suffrage, or to interfere with it, or to prescribe it at all. Every man in the United States anterior to the adoption of the fifteenth amendment got his right in every respect to vote by virtue of his citizenship as citizen of some State, and in no other way. Nor does the fifteenth amendment undertake to confer suffrage upon anybody. It only provides that the States in the exercise of their powers upon the subject of suffrage and political rights shall not deprive any person of the political right to vote for any one of three causes, to wit, race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

I beg to call the attention of the Senate to the decision of the Supreme Court in the Slaughter-house cases, and as it is so important, as this subject is an important one, I beg to read extracts from that opinion somewhat at length. First, as to the purpose of these amendments. The court says:

We repeat, then, in the light of this recapitulation of events, almost too recent to be called history, but which are familiar to us all, and on the most casual examination of the language of these amendments, no one can fail to be impressed with the one pervading purpose found in them all, lying at the foundation of each, and without which none of them would have been even suggested; we mean the freedom of the slave race, the security and firm establishment of that freedom, and the protection of the newly made freeman and citizen from the oppression of those who had formerly exercised unlimited dominion over him. It is true that only the fifteenth amendment, in terms, mentions the negro by speaking of his color and his slavery. But it is just as true that each of the other articles was addressed to the grievances of that race, and designed to remedy them, as the fifteenth.

We do not say that no one else but the negro can share in this protection. Both the language and the spirit of these articles are to have their fair and just weight in any question of construction. Undoubtedly while negro slavery alone was in the mind of the Congress which proposed the thirteenth article, it forbids any other kind of slavery, now or hereafter. If Mexican peonage or the Chinese cooly labor system shall develop slavery of the Mexican or Chinese race within our territory, this amendment may safely be trusted to make it void. And so if other rights are assailed by the States which properly and necessarily fall within the protection of these articles, that protection will apply though the party interested may not be of African descent. But what we do say, and what we wish to be understood, is that in any fair and just construction of any section or phrase of these amendments, it is necessary to look to the purpose which we have said was the pervading spirit of them all, the evil which they were designed to remedy, and the process of continued additions to the Constitution, until that purpose was supposed to be accomplished as far as constitutional law can accomplish it.

Thus, I say, we have from the Supreme Court of the United States a fair and just and disinterested account of the history and purposes of these amendments. This is the groundwork of them. It furnishes much light in ascertaining their true meaning and giving them a fair construction. Now let us see what construction this court have put upon the fourteenth amendment and what they say of it. I read again from the same opinion of the court:

The first section of the fourteenth article, to which our attention is more specially invited, opens with a definition of citizenship—not only citizenship of the United States, but citizenship of the States. No such definition was previously found in the Constitution, nor had any attempt been made to define it by act of Congress. It had been the occasion of much discussion in the courts, by the Executive Departments, and in the public journals. It had been said by eminent judges that no man was a citizen of the United States except as he was a citizen of one of the States composing the Union. Those, therefore, who had been born and resided always in the District of Columbia or in the Territories, though within the United States, were not citizens. Whether this proposition was sound or not had never been judicially decided. But it had been held by this court in the celebrated Dred Scott case, only a few years before the outbreak of the civil war, that a man of African descent, whether a slave or not, was not and could not be a citizen of a State or of the United States. This decision, while it met the condemnation of some of the ablest statesmen and constitutional lawyers of the country, had never been overruled; and if it was to be accepted as a constitutional limitation of the right of citizenship, then all the negro race who had recently been made freemen were still not only not citizens, but were incapable of becoming so by anything short of an amendment to the Constitution. To remove this difficulty primarily, and to establish a clear and comprehensive definition of citizenship which should declare what should constitute citizenship of the United States, and also citizenship of a State, the first clause of the first section was framed.

"All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside."

The first observation we have to make on this clause is that it puts at rest both the questions which we stated to have been the subject of differences of opinion. It declares that persons may be citizens of the United States without regard to their citizenship of a particular State, and it overturns the Dred Scott decision by making all persons born within the United States and subject to its jurisdiction citizens of the United States. That its main purpose was to establish the citizenship of the negro can admit of no doubt. The phrase "subject to its jurisdiction" was intended to exclude from its operation children of ministers, consuls, and citizens or subjects of foreign states born within the United States.

The next observation is more important in view of the arguments of counsel in the present case. It is, that the distinction between citizenship of the United States and citizenship of a State is clearly recognized and established. Not only may a man be a citizen of the United States without being a citizen of a State, but an important element is necessary to convert the former into the latter. He must reside within the State to make him a citizen of it, but it is only necessary that he should be born or naturalized in the United States to be a citizen of the Union.

It is quite clear, then, that there is a citizenship of the United States and a citizenship of a State, which are distinct from each other and which depend upon different characteristics or circumstances in the individual.

I come now to those clauses of this opinion which clearly point out the distinction that I have contended for, and to them I invite special attention:

We think this distinction and its explicit recognition in this amendment of great weight in this argument, because the next paragraph of this same section, which is the one mainly relied on by the plaintiffs in error, speaks only of privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, and does not speak of those of citizens of the several States. The argument, however, in favor of the plaintiffs rests wholly on the assumption that citizenship is the same and the privileges and immunities guaranteed by the clause are the same.

The language is, "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States." It is a little remarkable, if this clause was intended as a protection to the citizen of a State against the legislative power of his own State, that the words "citizens of the State" should be left out, when it is so carefully used, and used in contradistinction to citizens of the United States in the very sentence which precedes it. It is too clear for argument that the change in phraseology was adopted understandingly and with a purpose.

Of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the United States, and of the privileges and immunities of the citizen of the State, and what they respectively are, we will presently consider; but we wish to state here that it is only the former which are placed by this clause under the protection of the Federal Constitution, and that the latter, whatever they may be, are not intended to have any additional protection by this paragraph of the amendment.

If, then, there is a difference between the privileges and immunities belonging to a citizen of the United States as such and those belonging to the citizen of a State as such, the last must rest for their security and protection where they have heretofore rested, for they are not embraced by this paragraph of the amendment.

The first occurrence of the words "privileges and immunities" in our constitutional history is to be found in the fourth of the articles of the old Confederation.

It declares that the better to secure and perpetuate mutual friendship and intercourse among the people of the different States in this Union the free inhabitants of each of these States, paupers, vagabonds, and fugitives from justice excepted, shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of free citizens in the several States; and the people of each State shall have free ingress and regress to and from any other State, and shall enjoy therein all the privileges of trade and commerce, subject to the same duties, impositions, and restrictions as the inhabitants thereof respectively.

In the Constitution of the United States, which superseded the Articles of Confederation, the corresponding provision is found in section 2 of the fourth article, in the following words: "The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States."

There can be but little question that the purpose of both these provisions is the same and that the privileges and immunities intended are the same in each. In the article of the confederation we have some of these specifically mentioned, and enough perhaps to give some general idea of the class of civil rights meant by the phrase. It would be the vainest show of learning to attempt to prove by citations of authority that, up to the adoption of the recent amendments, no claim or pretense was set up that those rights depended on the Federal Government for their existence or protection, beyond the very few express limitations which the Federal Constitution imposed upon the States—such, for instance, as the prohibition against ex post facto laws, bills of attainder, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts. But, with the exception of these and a few other exceptions, the entire domain of the privileges and immunities of citizens of the States, as above defined, lay within the constitutional and legislative power of the States, and without that of the Federal Government. Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States in their most ordinary and useful functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. And still further, such a construction, followed by the reversal of the judgment of the supreme court of Louisiana in these cases, would constitute this court a perpetual censor upon all legislation of the States on the civil rights of their own citizens, with authority to nullify such as it did not approve as consistent with those rights as they existed at the time of the adoption of this amendment. The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when in fact it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal governments to each other, and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the Legislatures of the States which ratified them.

Now, Mr. President, could there be a more thorough, a more reasonable, a more logical, a more satisfactory exposition of the fourteenth amendment than that? Sir, that decision was not made without due consideration. It was made after thorough discussion on the part of counsel and after long and most solemn deliberation on the part of the court. They well understood the importance of what they were doing, and that they were laying the groundwork of a course of construction to be placed on these amendments to the Constitution that was to go down to the latest generations. They did their work deliberately, in the light of reason and right, and they have steadily kept up that construction of it from the time of the decision of the "Slaughter-house cases" until this moment.

Another case decided shortly after the "Slaughter-house cases" follows up the line of construction adopted in them, and I will read a paragraph or two from the case, the name of which I do not now remember; but it was the case where a female in one of the Northwestern States, perhaps in Illinois, insisted that she had a right under the fourteenth amendment to be permitted to practice law in the courts of the State. She insisted that to practice law was a right enjoyable by any citizen of the United States, and that as such a citizen she was well entitled under the fourteenth amendment under discussion to practice law in the State courts where she might happen to be. In deciding that case the court say:

In regard to that amendment, counsel for the plaintiff in this court truly says that there are certain privileges and immunities which belong to a citizen of the United States as such; otherwise it would be nonsense for the fourteenth amendment to prohibit a State from abridging them; and he proceeds to argue that admission to the bar of a State of a person who possesses the requisite learning and character is one of those which a State may not deny.

In this latter proposition we are not able to concur with counsel. We agree with him that there are privileges and immunities belonging to citizens of the United States in that relation and character, and that it is these, and these alone, which a State is forbidden to abridge. But the right to admission to practice in the courts of a State is not one of them. This right in no sense depends on citizenship of the United States. It has not, as far as we know, ever been made in any State or in any case to depend on citizenship at all. Certainly many prominent and distinguished lawyers have been admitted to practice, both in the State and Federal courts, who were not citizens of the United States, or of any State. But on whatever basis this right may be placed, so far as it can have any relation to citizenship at all, it would seem that, as to the courts of a State, it would relate to citizenship of the State, and as to Federal courts it would relate to citizenship of the United States.

The opinion just delivered in the Slaughter-house cases renders elaborate argument in the present case unnecessary; for, unless we are wholly and radically mistaken in the principles on which those cases are decided, the right to control and regulate the granting of license to practice law in the courts of a State is one of those powers which are not transferred for its protection to the Federal Government, and its exercise is in no manner governed or controlled by citizenship of the United States in the party seeking such license.

After that decision we find the opinions delivered but a day or two ago, following up the same views and giving in effect the same construction to the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments of the Constitution.

So that I say the construction placed on these amendments, whether you refer to one of them or to another, whereby it is proposed to give the Senate jurisdiction to raise this committee, is a false construction. It is a construction not warranted by the letter of the Constitution; it is not warranted by a fair construction of the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to it, or by a fair or reasonable inference, and that such a construction is expressly contravened and denied by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, which ought to be a law unto us here as it must be when any act which we may pass shall come to be when the courts come to take jurisdiction.

I confess, Mr. President, that I have no personal knowledge about the manner of conducting the late election in the State of Mississippi; and I agree with everybody who takes that view, that if colored men were deprived of their right to vote by fraud, intimidation, or by other means, it was a criminal act, one reprehensible in the highest degree; and I insist furthermore that whosoever was guilty of it ought to be punished, but he ought to be punished according to law; he ought to be punished by that tribunal which our system of government—and by that I mean both State and Federal combined—has provided for that purpose. If it shall be suggested that the means provided are not sufficient, I reply that that is the misfortune of the country. Congress has no powers except the powers conferred by the Constitution, and we are bound by that, and we cannot go beyond it if we would.

So far as my information goes, (and all that I have is hearsay,) there were no such irregularities in the late election as to warrant the complaints, the parade, and the tirade of abuse heaped on the people of Mississippi, and the declamation which I have heard in the Senate Chamber and elsewhere from time to time. According to accounts given by respectable gentlemen of both parties in the State of Mississippi, the election was conducted with remarkable quiet and fairness. The vote, as I understand, was large, and the irregularities were exceptional; they were as great probably on the one side in party politics as on the other; and the election was infinitely better conducted in that State than elections are usually conducted in some of the great States of the Union, and particularly in some of the great cities of the North.

So that it seems to me that the purpose here is not a legitimate one. It is not to ascertain facts to inform the judgment of Congress, to the end that Congress may pass the laws that are necessary and essential to protect the rights of citizens, but for the purpose of manufacturing political capital for the election which comes off in November next. Entertaining that view, as well as the view just mentioned, that we have not the constitutional power to pass this resolution, I shall not hesitate to vote against it.

If it were alleged that the laws regulating congressional elections were insufficient and it were proposed to gather information with a view to ascertain whether it would be wise to change or modify existing laws on that subject, then, if such a state of facts were presented as to warrant the exercise of that power, I should not hesitate to do it. But it is not pretended that there is any such purpose in view. It is expressly provided in this resolution that we are to inquire, not whether the State has passed a law denying to any citizen a right because of his color, his race, or his previous condition of servitude to vote, but whether John Smith, John Jones, and hundreds of others have not committed an offense cognizable only in the State courts. That is the proposition here, and there is no other presented by the resolutions before us. The Senate has no lawful power to raise a committee for any such purpose, and therefore I shall not vote for these resolutions.

But, sir, if the resolution is to pass, let us pass it in such a shape as that it will at least conform to the letter of the Constitution, that it will have some semblance of ground to rest upon. We have no right or power to inquire whether the election in Mississippi was conducted fairly or otherwise. That is a matter exclusively within the jurisdiction of the State of Mississippi. If frauds were practiced, if intimidation was practiced, if votes were bought and sold, that is a matter to be inquired into by the State authorities, and by them alone; certainly not by the Senate. It is not pretended that we can regulate their elections. It is suggested—I believe that phrase has been amended in the substitute—that the Legislature chosen at that election has elected a United States Senator, that his credentials are now in the Senate, and that he will be here on the 4th of March next claiming admission. It will be time enough for us to inquire into that election, and the means by which it was secured, when we shall get complete jurisdiction of the matter, when the time comes to give us lawful jurisdiction of the matter. We cannot inquire into that now. But when that time shall come, if half the members of the Legislature were elected by buying electors' votes, if negroes in Mississippi were driven from or to the polls by thousands by force, it has been conceded even by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] and must be conceded by every intelligent man, that the Senate has no power to inquire into that. As to how the members of the Legislature were elected, whether they were elected lawfully or otherwise, by what means they were elected, is a matter completely and exclusively within the jurisdiction of the Legislature of Mississippi. We cannot go behind the organization of that Legislature; our inquiry is limited to whether or not the Senator-elect when he shall apply, if his right shall be questioned, was elected according to the laws of the United States and the constitution and laws of Mississippi. We can inquire then whether he bought the vote of a member of the Legislature, or whether he intimidated a member and forced him to vote for him; but we cannot go back of his election by the Legislature and ascertain whether the members of the Legislature were elected by one means or another at the ballot-box. So I say, Mr. President, looking at this whole matter, and taking every reasonable view of it, that Congress has no jurisdiction to raise this committee. Therefore the substitute which takes the place of the original resolutions ought not to be adopted, and I will not support it by my vote. In my judgment it ought not to pass—it cannot lawfully pass, and if it shall, it will be a bad precedent.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I had occasion yesterday to say that under the first clause of the fourteenth amendment, which declares that every one born in the United States shall be a citizen thereof, taken in connection with the last clause of that amendment, which gives Congress the power by legislation to enforce the foregoing, a citizen of the United States had the right of being protected in the exercise of suffrage where it had been conferred upon him. To that my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] takes exception, and he tells us that the Supreme Court have decided otherwise. I beg my friend's pardon. The Supreme Court have never touched that question. There have been four cases decided in reference to the three amendments. One was the Slaughter-house case, to which he has referred, where the question was whether the fourteenth amendment did not secure every citizen against business monopolies. It did not relate in any manner to the question of suffrage. The next case was that of Minor vs. Happersett, the case alluded to by the Senator, where a female applied for the license to practice in the Supreme Court of the United States, found in 21 Wallace. That had no reference to the question of suffrage. The next case was the Grant Parish case, which was this: A number assembled at Colfax, in Grant Parish, Louisiana; a mob took away their arms, broke up the meeting, and murdered thirty of the number. This case has recently been decided by the Supreme Court. It involves the construction of the sixth section of the enforcement act, which is directed against conspiracies to deprive citizens of rights granted or secured by the Constitution of the United States. The court does not dispute the constitutionality of the sixth section of that act; but the decision reached is that the indictment did not charge that any one had interfered with rights which, in the opinion of the court, were granted and secured by the Constitution. That indictment, which I had occasion to look at, contained thirty-two different counts. The rights under the Constitution which it was charged had been violated were the right of peaceably assembling according to the first article of amendments, the right of bearing arms, and other rights named in the ten amendments to the Constitution. The Supreme Court decided within the last week that those amendments, as has been understood by us all, were only inhibitions and restrictions on Congress, and did not confer any rights on citizens.

There was another count in the indictment charging a violation of the fourteenth amendment, in that citizens had been deprived of life and property without due process of law. The court took the view which has been suggested by the Senator from North Carolina, that the fourteenth amendment, when it says that no State shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, is a prohibition on State legislation and not on individuals. From this view I dissent, as the amendment further provides that the State shall not deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. The only case under these amendments which has ever been decided by the Supreme Court in reference to suffrage that I am aware of is the recent case of United States vs. Reese and Foushee. And what was that case? There was an indictment against inspectors of election for refusing the vote of a colored man on account of his race and color. It was refused because he did not present evidence of having paid his tax, which was a prerequisite to voting, but he did present his affidavit to the effect that he had offered to pay his tax, and that the wrongful act of the tax-collector had prevented his tax from being paid.

In this case the court say in brief that the first section of the enforcement act is only declaratory, there being no sanction annexed; that the second section does not apply to inspectors of election, and these defendants were inspectors; that the third section is a general regulation, and does not make the crime to depend upon depriving one of a vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude—which is an essential quality to a crime under the fifteenth amendment—and that therefore there was no case. If there had been six more words in the act of Congress, to wit, "on account of race or color," the law would have described a crime under a constitutional law.

I do not see that any one can much object to that decision.

Mr. MERRIMON. The court do not say so. The court say expressly that Congress has as yet not legislated in such a way as to execute the fifteenth amendment, and what legislation is necessary for that purpose the court do not undertake to say or suggest.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I have read that decision. I repeat what I have said. The clear effect of the decision is that the objection to the law is that it is a general regulation, applicable to the rejection of any vote, instead of only making it a crime, as does the amendment, to deprive one of a vote on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. The entire reasoning of the court takes that view. It considers the question whether the first section, with the third and fourth taken together, amounts only to a prohibition against rejecting a vote on account of race and color; but, being a penal statute, the court decide that the statute is not capable of being so construed. I think my friend will agree with me that, if there had been six more words in the statute, the court would have given judgment for the plaintiffs in error. But that is not important to my purpose.

One thing is certain: the question whether Congress has not by legislation the right to protect the citizen, who has been invested with the right to vote, from being deprived of his vote by violence or fraud has never been adjudicated against in this country. The court say in express words in the only decision they have made relative to voting since the amendments were adopted that their whole decision rests upon the fifteenth amendment, counsel for the plaintiffs in error having given up all claim that the case was to be sustained under the fourteenth. Whether that was wise is not now the question.

Mr. MERRIMON. Passing by what the court said—in fact, they said nothing on that subject—I beg my honorable friend to explain to the Senate how he derives the power from the fifteenth amendment that he claims?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I will. There is, then, we see, nothing in the decisions of the Supreme Court, upon which my friend has placed himself, declaring that suffrage when conferred and as conferred upon a citizen is not a right of a citizen, which Congress may by proper legislation under the first and last clauses of the fourteenth amendment protect. Now let us go on a step further. Is the right to vote a natural right?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; we agree. And yet it comes very near to it. Where does the right come from? From the Constitution. How does it get into the Constitution? It is placed there by the convention. Who make the convention? The people. How is their will made known? Only by voting. So, sir, while I agree voting is not a natural right, government could not exist without it and could not be formed without it. It is the initial step in civilization.

Mr. MERRIMON. Voting is not a civil right.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It is not a natural right. And now I ask, is voting a necessary incident to citizenship?

Mr. MERRIMON. No, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No, of course it is not; if it were, every woman and child would have the right to vote. Neither one of these two propositions, however, conflicts with my position, that when by law the right to vote is given to a citizen it is right to be protected from being violently and fraudently taken from the citizen. Unless the right of citizenship was a mere decoration, it carries with it protection to its incidents, protection in the exercise of that suffrage which the law has conferred. The proposition is too plain to be questioned. My friend will not question that North Carolina has the right to protect its citizen from being deprived by fraud and violence of the right the law has conferred upon him. He will not deny that it is the duty of his State thus to do, and that, too, because of the citizenship of him who claims the protection. It is the same with a citizen of the United States.

Citizenship of a State confers all the rights that grow out of the constitution and laws of the State. Citizenship of the United States confers all the rights that grow out of the Constitution and laws of the United States. That is clear. Does not the right to vote for Representatives grow out of the Constitution of the United States?

Mr. MERRIMON. It does not.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I insist that it does, sir.

Mr. MERRIMON. Then we are at issue.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But for the Constitution of the United States no man would have a right to vote for a Representative. The Constitution of the United States in express terms creates United States voters, United States electors, and specifies their qualifications.

Mr. MERRIMON. It provides that the State may provide them, expressly.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. The Constitution of the United States says:

> The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

This Constitution provides that there shall be United States electors, and specifies as their qualifications that they shall have the same that are required in the State for the most numerous branch of the Legislature. Not only that, but this Constitution further provides, by the fourth section of the first article, that Congress shall have the right to regulate the manner in which those United States electors shall cast their votes.

Before the recent amendments to the Constitution I agree that United States citizenship was a very vague thing. One article of the Constitution declared "that citizens in each State should be entitled to all the privileges and immunities of citizens of the several States." That only created an equality of right; that only said that there was to be no discrimination. In the Dred Scott case it was established that every State had the right to fix and determine upon the qualification of its own citizens; that it had a perfect right to say that one of African blood should not be a citizen. Such was the condition of the law when the fourteenth amendment was adopted, and that changed all this and established it that every person born or naturalized in the United States and subject to the jurisdiction thereof should be a citizen of the United States and of the State in which he resides. Before that amendment citizenship of the United States, except in the single case of naturalization, was derivative from State citizenship, and the State could exclude one-half or nine-tenths of all her people from being citizens of the United States.

Then we have this case: Before the amendment there were United States electors with specified qualifications. Before the amendment Congress had the right to regulate the manner in which those electors should cast their votes. The Constitution has since placed a restriction even on the States as to what qualifications United States electors shall possess, and has said that they shall be exempt from discrimination on account of race or color. We have then under the Constitution United States electors, we have their qualifications fixed, we have modified those qualifications, and the nation has declared in express words that there shall be a United States citizenship, and has declared that Congress shall have all power by appropriate legislation to carry into effect this grand declaration of United States citizenship. This is the sublime rescue of the war. Can it now be denied that, where the citizen has by law the right to vote, Congress has the power to protect this right from fraud and violence? Sir, it is to accuse this nation of an imbecility with which no nation on the earth can be charged. Is it true that this nation alone of all the world, with a written Constitution declaring that there shall be a national citizenship which should give protection in every nook and corner of the world, is unable to afford its citizens any succor? Is it true that the proud cry "I am an American citizen" is to become a shame and a hissing in the earth?

No, sir, we have the right and the power, too, to protect American citizenship at home and abroad.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I did not know that the Senator from New Jersey had adverted to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Minor vs. Happersett, in 21 Wallace, at the time he was considering his proposition.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I am perfectly familiar with it, and I referred to it.

Mr. BAYARD. His argument was that the amendments to the Constitution had in some way conferred on Congress power to protect the right of voting in any man, provided that right had been given by the law of a State. The Supreme Court have spoken so distinctly upon this subject that it seems to me that when we legislate in the light of their decisions and still propose to pass laws which have been adjudicated invalid, to say the least, we are executing a very useless task. It is a labor lost, time spent in vain, to say the least, and perhaps it would be more proper to designate it as willfully spent in vain. If the adjudications of the court of last resort are not in any respect to form the guide for those who legislate, then there was little use in the creation of the judiciary as a co-ordinate and independent branch of our Government. I believe in the right of conscientious opinion. We may comply with the decisions of a court against our will; but that as legislators we are justified in continuing to repeat legislation of a character and nature based upon principles which have been declared to be invalid by the Supreme Court of the United States, I think is utterly unjustified and unjustifiable.

Here was a case in 1874, decided at the October term, to be found on page 171 of the twenty-first volume of Wallace, in which the court declares, in speaking of the fourteenth amendment:

> The amendment did not add to the privileges and immunities of a citizen. It simply furnished an additional guarantee for the protection of such as he already had. No new voters were necessarily made by it. Indirectly it may have had that effect, because it may have increased the number of citizens entitled to suffrage under the constitution and laws of the State, but it operates for this purpose—

And I commend this language to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That was the case where some female applied for admission to the bar, was it not?

Mr. BAYARD. I believe so.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I do not differ from that case at all. I think it was right.

Mr. BAYARD. I am speaking of the principles the court lay down:

> It operates for this purpose, if at all, through the States and the State laws, and not directly upon the citizen.
> It is clear, therefore, we think, that the Constitution has not added the right of suffrage to the privileges and immunities of citizenship as they existed at the time it was adopted. This makes it proper to inquire whether suffrage was co-extensive with the citizenship of the States at the time of its adoption. If it was, then it may with force be argued that suffrage was one of the rights which belonged to citizenship, and in the enjoyment of which every citizen must be protected. But if it was not, the contrary may with propriety be assumed.

And after reciting the history of the constitutions of the various States on the subject they declare:

> Being unanimously of the opinion that the Constitution of the United States does not confer the right of suffrage upon any one, and that the constitutions and laws of the several States which commit that important trust to men alone are not necessarily void, we affirm the judgment.

In the case of The United States vs. Reese and Foushee, decided three or four days ago by the Supreme Court, the statement is distinctly made that no right of suffrage was conferred by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution, much less by the fourteenth; and therefore to assert that there was a substantive grant of power by those two amendments which under the suggestion that the creation of a citizenship carried with it some of the privileges which may or may not attend citizenship, which are not essential for the existence of citizenship, which may be granted or withheld to or from certain classes at the discretion of the law-making power of the State, it seems to me that to so claim now, and to say that the United States can create this privilege, or that they can in any way protect it if the States should have created it beforehand, is certainly to argue in the face of the direct letter and spirit of the adjudications of the Supreme Court on this subject. They tell you distinctly that, "if even indirectly it may have the effect of making new voters, it is through the States and the State laws," and that the amendment does not act directly upon the citizen. What do they mean by that? It does not act directly upon the citizen. It may be inhibitory of the State. If the Constitution does not act directly on the citizen in this respect, surely it is competent for Congress to legislate and by its laws act directly on the citizen. Therefore it will be found after this scheme of legislation may be pursued according to the theory of the Senator from New Jersey, if he and those who think like him shall be able to place on the statute-book laws of the same character and reaching the same results as those which they have so elaborately prepared and enacted before, when they have applied to them the touch-stone of judicial construction as given in these cases, they will meet the same fate; they will be found invalid, because it will be an attempted infringement by the Congress of the United States upon the reserved rights of the States and the people of the States.

This course of decision has not been a sudden one upon the part of the Supreme Court. They have seen the tide of centralization rushing with a fearful and a fatal force until it has become necessary to arrest it, and to recall the spirit of this country and the spirit of this legislation back to the true character of the federal system of government under which we live. They see that the States are as essential to our form of government as is the Federal power over them to our form of government; that, to use the language of the late Mr. Justice Nelson, of New York, if you strike down the State governments you annihilate the Government of the United States and cause it to disappear from among the family of nations. Therefore I say, in respect of this most important of all questions, that, if this be a government, it is a voluntary government, of which the whole motive power is suffrage. Every operation of our Government has its basis upon the exercise of suffrage. We vote for everything that becomes a law in every stage, from the primary meeting of the people to the final vote in the Legislature, which has the power to enact a law. It is a question of votes. It is a question of volition. If that power has been or can be by any construction taken from the people of the States—the States, which are the pillars that support the fabric of our General Government—if you take that power from them and give it to the control of the Federal Congress, then you have handed the whole control of this country, necessarily, to one centralized power, into the hands of Congress.

Mr. President, to admit the propositions of my honorable friend from New Jersey would be to admit that the theory of our Government is to be reversed. It would have this effect: These two amendments would operate to repeal all the amendments and every feature of the Constitution that had preceded them. This cannot be. You may fritter away a power by construction and you may destroy a government by misconstruction. It is insidious. It is most dangerous. Although gentlemen may act under what I believe is in many cases a very honest feeling in the land, under a desire to stand by those who are helpless, for those who may be believed to form the weaker party and the weaker race in this country, still I ask them not to be misled by a sentimentality against so essential a provision, so essential a portion of the very frame-work, the very ground-work, the foundation of our governmental system. Do not invade that right essential to the existence of the State under the pretense that you are protecting in some way some one in the exercise of it. Your laws give the protection. If a law does discriminate against a voter by reason of race or color, it is invalid. Apply to it the touch-stone of judicial decision, either in the States, or, if no fidelity is found there, (and you have no right to presume that,) bring it to your Federal courts, and there under our system the cure can be and will be applied. But can it be that we have lived nearly one hundred years, that the right of no white man to have his vote protected has ever been sought under Federal power; and that now, under the pretext of the new enfranchisement of a lately servile people, you are to change your form of government in order to obtain a protection for the black that your country has never in its history had occasion to extend to the white? Leave them, the black man and the white man, alone to the same power that has kept us and preserved us as a people for the last one hundred years, or very nearly that. It is not necessary. There is this constant distrust; there is this constant refusal to trust without having any cause for it.

I wish gentlemen could have a little time to test the voluntary sense of justice of the people of the States. Do not let every presumption be that wrong, injustice, the withholding of rights is to be the rule in all the States. I know they are mistaken. I do not believe a party could attempt it and carry it out without meeting the opposition of the spirit of the majority of the American people. Trust, then, to the mere desire to maintain popular power and popular favor. If no other or higher motive comes, trust that as a motive to perform justice. Do not base all your presumptions of legislation here upon the fact that the States of this country do not propose to do their duty by all their citizens. Do not suppose that the best refuge and the best sanctuary for the right of an American freeman are only in the Federal courts of this country. It is the same spirit through all. All are American courts. Do not for the sake of this temporary power, which is yours to-day and may leave you to-morrow, invoke an authority which some day may be used to interfere with that right of free local self-government which is the very foundation and the very soul of our system of government.

The Supreme Court have, as I say, not only intimated, but I think have most clearly decided, that you cannot justly exercise this power, that no right of suffrage is given, that the general power of protection is not given by these amendments. The grant is confined to a single case; and in regard to that there is a very great halt in their decision and a want of definition as to what precisely they may come at when you shall frame a statute in some different way. But sure it is that statutes running nearly in the same groove as those you have adopted, statutes which may be called in pari materia, will be open not to grave doubt but to certain denial when they shall reach the decision of the courts of the United States. I know that this question has been debated in Congress. I know that the decisions of the Supreme Court are distasteful to the majority here who have voted for these laws; but do not, I beg of you, show simply your impatience or insubordination where a check has been given to your legislation. I beg of you, with all the feeling of one American toward another, to trust the American people. Trust the people of the American States. Do not let it go forth that the men of this country, white or black, have no protection except in Federal tribunals. It is unjust to the States; it is unjust to the people; it is creating a certain collision of feeling and of sympathy between the States and the Federal Government, which ought to move along each in its own orbit, undisturbing and undisturbed. If the Congress and if the Senate would but consider that, after all, ours is a government of opinion, it will assert itself, it ought to assert itself, it will be trusted and it ought to be trusted. Yet the whole spirit of the legislation of Congress for the last ten years upon this subject seems to me to have been that the States, the people of the States, the tribunals of the States, cannot fairly be trusted to carry out the guarantees given by the Constitution of the United States to every human being in their midst.

Mr. President, I did not intend to say as much as I have uttered. I heard the remarks of the honorable Senator from New Jersey yesterday. I was surprised to find the construction that he had given to these amendments, and that he was endeavoring to find in them the conference of power, of right of suffrage upon citizens which the Supreme Court had expressly denied, and which, according to my own interpretation, was nowhere to be found in the amendments.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware has in rather an unusual manner read a lecture to the Senate. He deprecates the whole legislation for the last ten years. I wonder whether the Senator does not deprecate the enactment of the three amendments to the Constitution which this legislation has been enforcing?

Mr. BAYARD. I beg pardon.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I say the Senator deprecates the legislation of Congress for the last ten years. Did the enactment of the three constitutional amendments meet his approval?

Mr. BAYARD. I have expressed nothing contrary to it; made no such suggestions.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I know that is so, but I ask the question because when we are thus lectured about pride of opinion, impatience, and chafing under the decisions of the Supreme Court, and when we are begged not entirely to ruin the country, it is natural to inquire what is the source from which these strictures come; and if found to come from one who from first to last has been opposed to the amendments we are enforcing, amendments abolishing slavery, establishing American citizenship, establishing universal suffrage, then we can understand that the criticism is not so severe upon our conduct, but that it is accounted for by the state of mind and the political view of the Senator who administers the admonition.

The Senator complains that we have willfully spent time here in differing from the Supreme Court. The Senator must be a true Calvinist, for he not only thinks that everybody should believe as he believes, but that they should be punished for their unbelief. I do not propose myself to do anything that I know will damage this country much, nor do I propose to be lectured very much as to the manner in which I discharge my duties as Senator.

As to the Supreme Court, let me say that I have as much respect for their decisions as any man in the country; but what is a decision? It is the adjudication of the question before the court, and their opinion that legitimately grows out of the question, that is entitled to all consideration; but the dicta that may be scattered through their opinions are not law to us.

The question that we were discussing was not, as my friend has said, whether the constitutional amendments gave the right of suffrage. No one has pretended that the Constitution or any of the amendments conferred the right of suffrage. Ordinary attention to the debate would have shown the Senator that that was not the position insisted upon. The claim was that where the citizen had by law the right of suffrage the National Government had the power to protect that right from being destroyed by violence and fraud; a very different proposition from that which he has argued. He refers to the decisions of the Supreme Court. What are they? One is the question whether monopolies did not violate the fourteenth amendment. Another, a case to which he refers and in view of which he asks our abject subservience to the Supreme Court, is whether a female can practice law in the United States courts. What have those decisions to do with the question before us? More than that, the Supreme Court have not ever put forth any dictum that I am aware of denying that Congress had the right, where suffrage existed as a right, to protect it from being destroyed by violence or fraud. This is a right that I claim not as the Senator states in behalf of the black man. I claim it, sir, for the white man as well as the colored. I hope to see the day when everywhere in this broad land, South and North, East and West, every citizen will be protected not only in his suffrage, but in his property, his life, and his liberty. Then we will have peace.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I have listened with great attention to the debate in reference to the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, and I desire to make one or two suggestions in regard to them. The question is whether under either or both these amendments Congress can pass a law to protect the man who goes to vote from being mobbed, or from unlawful violence, in the exercise of his right. I am not able to understand, after listening to the arguments, how Congress can do it. I ask the attention of Senators for a moment to the fourteenth amendment, which declares that—

All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside.

Of course it is not claimed that that makes anybody a voter. If it did, it would make all the females in the country voters. They are born within the Federal jurisdiction, and yet the United States courts have held that this cannot be construed to confer the right of voting upon them. It goes further, and I call attention to this to test the argument that we can protect the legal elector from violence by a mob or other unlawful interference on election day:

No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

If under the fourteenth amendment we can by act of Congress protect the voter in exercising the right of suffrage, much more strongly may it be argued that we can protect the owner of personal property from being deprived of his right to it by violence. Will any one claim that under that strong language authorizing Congress to protect any man in his rights we can pass penal laws or criminal laws to protect a man from having his property taken from him by mobs or by violence? If so, it would have been a very valuable right to have exercised in reference to some of the Northern States, whereas in some of them combinations of men have prevented persons from even using their property by hiring labor, and so on. I believe it is conceded that Congress has no power under this or any other amendment to protect a man from being mobbed by his fellow-citizens or to prevent his personal or real estate from being taken from him by violence.

Therefore I argue that, under the fourteenth amendment, if we cannot pass laws to protect a man in his property from unlawful violence, we cannot protect him in exercising the right of suffrage. As the amendment reads, it protects the citizen not against mobs but against laws by a State which would deprive him of his rights. The courts would hold such State laws invalid, and hence he could get redress in that way. Then there is the same provision in the fourteenth amendment as in the fifteenth, that—

The Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

If then, as I think gentlemen will concede, we cannot legislate to protect the citizen of a State from unlawful violence which deprives him of his property, we have not the power under that provision to make a law which shall protect him in the exercise of the right of voting. He must look to State laws alone. That provision of the fourteenth amendment was to prevent the States from passing laws which should interfere with the rights of the citizen.

Take the fifteenth amendment. Under that have we a right to say that we the Congress can protect a man from intimidation, from violence, in exercising the right to vote, or does it not simply protect the people of a State from injustice, from unwise discriminations in reference to voting? Mark you, it does not give any affirmative right, but it is like the fourteenth amendment. It says:

The right of citizens of the United States to vote—

Just as though it read "the right of citizens of the United States to hold their property"— shall not be denied or abridged by the United States, or by any State, on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Is not that in the same spirit? It is substantially the same language. Neither the United States nor the States shall discriminate against any class of citizens in a State on account of race, color, or previous condition. Can you from that infer that we may by law protect the citizen from unlawful combinations that intimidate him or prevent his voting? It seems to me, according to my reading of the Constitution, that these provisions only refer to restraining the States. They recognize, as has been recognized from the beginning, that the States make such persons electors as they see fit. In one State they may have a property qualification; in another there is an educational or some other test. This amendment merely operates as a prohibition on the State, saying to it, "You shall not discriminate against men in making voters on account of their color or on account of their race or previous condition." It was not intended, nor would it be wise that the people of the States should have to look for the protection of their persons to the General Government which has its head in this city.

I agree as earnestly as any man can in the importance of having the electoral right exercised everywhere without fear, without fraud, and without intimidation to the elector. This Government is built upon the idea that the mass of the voters will act honestly and without intimidation in depositing their ballots. The idea was that if they erred the error would be corrected; that if the time came when any man or any body of men could by fraud or by bribery or by intimidation change the result of an election, this Government could not exist. That is one of the things which I think every good citizen should denounce, and I do here denounce it earnestly wherever it occurs, whether it is preached by Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, or whether it is preached or practiced elsewhere. I propose to stand by the men who are against tampering with the judgment of the electors by bribes, who are against affecting them by intimidation, who are against carrying an election by fraud, contrary to the will of the voters, because I am earnest in the belief that the perpetuity of our Government, State and national, must depend upon the votes of the people being unbiased by bribes or threats and unaffected by fraud. While I believe that the elections should be free from all these influences, yet I do not believe that we shall by resolutions like this—I speak very respectfully—do very much toward remedying the evils which exist in the State to which it is proposed to send this committee. We must appeal to the people of the State. We must appeal to public opinion. We must insist that for our own sake there be honest, unbiased, unintimidated electors at the polls.

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator allow me to put one question to him?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. HOWE. If the State of New York shall decline or refuse to punish a citizen of the State who shall assault a foreign minister within her jurisdiction——

Mr. KERNAN. O, I understand that foreign ministers are exceptions in the Government of the United States. I do not desire to go into that.

Mr. HOWE. I will not interfere with the Senator if he does not desire it.

Mr. KERNAN. I would rather proceed with my remarks and say a few words in regard to the practical question before us as to the power of Congress to interfere with the elections in a State. I heard with some regret yesterday the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] charge, as I understood him, that in his opinion the great mass of the party to which I belong and with which I act at the North really were in favor of disfranchising and wronging out of the right of suffrage the colored people of the South. I should be very sorry, not only for the colored people but for the white citizens all over the country, if any such feeling existed. I assure the Senator it does not exist. I assure him, and I say it to the people of the South, both white and colored, that that body of men, so far as they shall have power, will be, in my judgment, as faithful as any other body of men in protecting the colored men of the South in all their rights before the law. I would despise the party of men who would feel that it would be to them a pleasure to wrong those citizens out of the rights now given to them by the Constitution. Every suggestion of self-interest, as well as everything that should appeal to manly men, requires that they should have all their rights under and before the law. What the country needs is not all the time scrambling to see who shall get a body of voters. What this country needs, North and South, is that there should be a policy pursued to make the people of the Southern States, both white and colored, feel that their interest and our interest require that there should be a just, wise, and fair policy pursued toward the colored men, to the end that instead of being there in distress and under wrong they may become an influential body of citizens, building up prosperity with us, living in harmony with the white people of the South. The two classes are placed together there, and it is my hope and belief that if we can allay somewhat the party feeling which exists so strongly, and inculcate upon them that it is their right and their duty to manage their own affairs, to live in amity and peace, to vote every man according to his judgment, honestly, unquestioned, and unintimidated, we shall have a better state of things down there, resulting from those sentiments and that public opinion, than will come out of any partisan or unkind debate in the halls of legislation.

I am not delivering a lecture now; I am a new man here and mean to be modest; but I ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether such appeals as he made yesterday in this Hall will do good, either North or South? I listened with great pleasure to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] this morning, to his temperate, his manly presentation of the case of his people, his appeal to them that it was their interest that there should be amity with the whites. Indeed, he said that with a portion there was, while as to others there was not; but still he appealed to the proper sentiment. If there be men at the North—and I have not met them—who would wrong these people, if they have the spirit of Americans in them, the sentiment to which the Senator from Mississippi appealed would take that feeling from them and make them say: "These men in the past were in a condition which leaves them now quite helpless as a class, and we will stand with them, and we will stand North as they stand South, seeing to it that they have their rights." Let that sentiment be promulgated through the country, and I believe it will do more good than anything else can in putting down the combinations which are spoken of, if they exist. I am against White Leagues, North or South; I am against all secret societies that seek to attack a class and seek to affect voters by that which is unjust, and by anything except an appeal to their judgment and to their intelligence.

Another thing I regretted to hear yesterday from the Senator from Massachusetts. He in a somewhat excited state spoke as though it was a thing to be denounced that there were men here who lived at the South and who were aiding in their legal capacity as Representatives in investigating alleged frauds, as though it was enough to put them down to say that such men were here. I want to assure my friend from Massachusetts that that will not meet an echo in the hearts or minds of the North or anywhere else. The people, the democrats, the republicans in our northern States are most anxious that the Representatives from every quarter should act together, those from the South and those from the North, the honest men of every party, in investigating frauds and abuses, and when they discover them then apply the remedy. I am sure the Senator from Massachusetts will agree that he will join hands with men, North or South, in doing that.

Mr. President, I do not favor this resolution. I do not believe it will bring about a better state of things among the people to whom it relates. I do not believe that our discussing it here and sending a committee to investigate there will right the wrong; but I do believe that if men in these Halls and men at the North will cease to endeavor to make the colored people of the South think that one great party of this country would violate the Constitution to wrong them and oppress them, as would be unworthy of men anywhere, they will begin to have faith that their rights will be protected; the southern men themselves will find that there is no party anywhere that will unite with them in any secret attempts to intimidate, or corrupt, or defraud voters of any class of the right of suffrage, and we shall have that people all united, voting as they please, for one party or the other, and we shall not have any need of investigations, nor shall we have to rely on penal laws for the protection of the electors, high or low, intelligent or ignorant, in any portion of the country.

Mr. OGLESBY. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. Let us get through with this resolution.

Mr. OGLESBY. Can we get through with this to-day?

Mr. MORTON. I trust so. I hope the Senate will stay here and dispose of this matter, and then I shall have no objection to the adoption of the motion of my friend from Illinois.

Mr. OGLESBY. My motion was not to adjourn now, but that when the Senate adjourns to-day——

Mr. MORTON. I understand what it is.

Mr. OGLESBY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, it was not my expectation to say one word on this resolution, and I was ready to vote upon it some days ago; but, since debate has sprung up upon it, I wish to state very briefly my reasons for voting against it.

I expressed to the Senate years ago my opinion that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, like certain provisions in the original Constitution, are simply limitations upon the power of the States as States; that they do not of themselves confer rights, but they simply operate to prevent the States from denying certain privileges to the persons who are named in them, or, to speak more broadly and accurately, from doing certain things that are specified in them.

The resolution, as amended by the Senator from Michigan, rests entirely upon an averment in the preamble, an averment that certain persons, it is said—

> On account of their color, race, or previous condition of servitude, were, by intimidation and force, deterred from voting, or compelled to vote contrary to their wishes for candidates and in support of parties to whom they were opposed, and their right to the free exercise of the elective franchise as secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution thus practically denied and violated.

It is seen from this recital that the whole ground for the inquiry suggested by the preamble is that the right of suffrage in the State of Mississippi has been interfered with by violence, and we are called upon to have an investigation to see whether such is the fact or not, and we are so called upon because this preamble recites that this right of suffrage is secured by the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution. Now, Mr. President, I undertake to say that neither the fourteenth nor the fifteenth amendment to the Constitution confers upon anybody the right of suffrage; but that the power to prescribe who hall possess that right is still left to the States, with one limitation upon them that they shall not discriminate against anybody on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

The fourteenth article of amendment, it is admitted on all hands, gives to no one the right of suffrage; on the contrary, it recognizes the right of a State to make discriminations. It provides in its second section:

> Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion, or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

Here is an express recognition of the right of the people of a State to settle the elective franchise in their own State, and there is no limitation upon it at all; but there is a certain penalty, that if they disqualify any male person, be he white or be he black, who is twenty-one years of age and a citizen of the United States, if they disfranchise him for any reason other than participation in the rebellion or the commission of crime, then their representation in Congress shall be proportionately reduced, thus inflicting a penalty upon them, it is true, but still leaving them at liberty, so far as the fourteenth amendment is concerned, to fix a qualification for voting as they please and incur the penalty, that is, suffer the reduction of political power. It must then be admitted that the fourteenth amendment confers upon nobody the right to vote. Then what is the fifteenth amendment?

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

What right is here spoken of? Does that confer upon anybody a right to vote? Manifestly, if it speaks of any right, it speaks of a right that existed at the time that this amendment was adopted; and what right then existed? It is true the amendment says "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States." Had any man the right to vote in virtue of his quality as a citizen of the United States? Nobody pretends that. He must vote in some State, and he cannot vote in that State unless he is a citizen of that State and unless her constitution permits him to vote. The fact that he is a citizen of the United States does not entitle him to vote unless the constitution of the State entitles him to vote. Every woman born in the United States or naturalized here is a citizen of the United States; every minor born in this country is a citizen of the United States. But women have no right of suffrage; minors have no right of suffrage. Bare citizenship of the United States, then, confers no right to vote. The whole question is still left to the States. But there is this limitation put on the power of the States, just as limitations are put in the original Constitution on the powers of the States, that in settling the question of the elective franchise they shall not discriminate against any man on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude, but that if he is a citizen of the United States and if he possesses the qualifications that white men in that State must possess under its constitution and laws to entitle them to vote, he shall have the same right. But that does not prevent a State, if it see fit, from imposing qualifications. Every State in this Union might have the qualification which now exists in the State of Massachusetts, what is called the reading and writing qualification—or the reading qualification; I do not remember whether it extends to writing or not—that no man shall vote unless he can read and write the English language. A State may impose such qualification, if it see fit to do it, and all the fifteenth amendment requires is that it shall impose it upon white people and colored people alike. A State may, for anything in the fifteenth amendment impose a poll-tax and require that tax to be paid before the citizen shall enjoy the elective franchise. That may be done.

All that the fifteenth amendment requires is that the same law that exists for the white man shall exist for the colored man. It confers no right whatsoever upon any individual to vote; nor does it limit the power of the States to fix the qualifications for the elective franchise, except to say that what is the qualification for a white man shall be the qualification for a colored man also.

This being the case, and the limitation being simply on the power of the State as a State, what have we to do with the question whether mobs have occurred in the State of Mississippi which have affected or intimidated voters? Has the State of Mississippi, as a State, the State in her sovereign capacity—(for I will use that word, especially since it is used by the Supreme Court only the other day in deciding these cases that have been referred to, though it is not an agreeable term to my friend from Indiana)—has the State of Mississippi, in her sovereign capacity, done anything to abridge the right of any man in that State to vote on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude? Does anybody pretend that? Why, sir, at the last election, the election spoken of, what was the government of Mississippi? Republican in all its departments—the governor republican; both branches of the General Assembly republican; nearly every judge in the State republican; nearly every Commonwealth officer in the State whose duty it was to prosecute criminals republican. In a word, the whole power of that State was in the hands of one party. Did that party, which held all the offices in that State, which was clothed with the executive, the legislative, and the judicial power, abridge the right of any man to vote on account of his race, color, or previous condition of servitude? Did the State government do any such thing? Every man will say, "no."

But we are told that this was done against the will of the State government; it was done against the wishes of the State government; it was done in defiance of the State government. Then it was not done by the State, Mr. President. Then your fifteenth constitutional amendment has no application to it any more than it has to the Molly Maguires of Pennsylvania—not one particle more. The moment you show that the State has not abridged any man's right, the moment you show that if any man has been abridged of his right, it has been in defiance of the State, and not by the State, that very moment you show that the fifteenth amendment has no application and lays no foundation at all for the inquiry which the Senator from Indiana proposes. I say, therefore, that no good can come of this investigation, no legislation can be based upon it.

What did the Senator from Mississippi say in his speech to-day—and I join with my friend from New York in remarking that I listened to portions of that speech with the entire approbation of my judgment; and although I think the speaker omitted one great fact that is necessary to a complete and accurate picture, yet I commend the spirit in which he spoke and the decency of his utterances, which might well be imitated by men who have held higher places in the Government and had more experience than his. What did he say? "We do not want any new legislation; what we want is that the existing legislation shall be enforced." That is what he said. Why is it not enforced? You have had republicans in power in every department of Mississippi ever since the close of the rebellion; you have had a republican administration in the Federal Government ever since the close of the rebellion; you have passed law after law; you have clothed your United States marshals with power to summon a perfect army to aid them in the execution of the laws; you have clothed your United States commissioners with powers of arrest that make a man tremble to read them. You have done all this. Now, if the laws have not been executed, I want to know why they have not been executed. It is no fault of democratic officials; it is no fault of democratic members of Congress. You have had all the laws you asked for; you have passed them; you have had all the republican officials you wished to appoint to execute those laws. If they have not been executed under these circumstances; if they are sufficient; if, as the Senator from Mississippi has told us to-day, no new legislation is needed, but only the execution of laws already in force, your mode of redress instead of a committee of investigation into supposed intimidation should be a committee to find out why your own officials have not performed their duty. Begin with them; bring them to trial and punishment if they have neglected to discharge their duty.

Ah, but, Mr. President, that would not make a very good campaign document next fall. It would be a document of a very different kind from one that, upon all the loose hearsay or all the actual proofs, should show up the violence or supposed violence, the intimidation or supposed intimidation, that took place at the last election in Mississippi. There is the difference as wide as the sea. Call your republican officials to account for not executing the laws, and your document would injure instead of aid the republican party next fall. But get up a frightful picture, whether upon true or false testimony, of a violation of the rights of the colored men in the South, of intimidation, violence, and the like—do that, and then every stump speaker of your party can go upon the stump, and shake it in the face of the people, and say, as the Senator from Massachusetts did, that no southern man can be trusted and that when he talks in favor of the Union he lies! Well, for one, I will not aid in making any such campaign fodder. For one I will not pay out the people's money for any such purpose. For one I will not agree that we shall exercise a power that is not conferred upon us by the Constitution, simply to make electioneering documents for any party, either my own or any other. I therefore will not vote for this resolution. There is no necessity for it.

Now upon the question of whether there has been intimidation or violence down there, I have no opinion to express. I have seen statements both ways upon that point, but one thing I do say, that the idea that the white people of Mississippi or of any other State organize for the purpose of tyrannizing over the colored population and depriving them of their rights, seems to me to be pretty well answered by a few general considerations. Who constitute the mass of the laboring population in the State of Mississippi? Confessedly the colored people. They are in the majority. The great amount of property in that State is held by the whites. The colored population necessarily are a population of laborers. Who need their services? The property-holders. In what does property in Mississippi mainly consist? In land; it is an agricultural State. There is scarcely a manufactory in it; it is as much an agricultural State as, if not more so than, any State in all this Union. It has no sea-port of any consequence. It is almost purely an agricultural State and needs agricultural labor, and the colored population there are the agricultural laborers to a great extent; in fact, to the greatest extent. Will anybody tell me that the property-holders there, the white population, want to tyrannize over that laboring population so as to make them leave the State; make it impossible for them to remain there? They need that laboring population as much as that laboring population needs their good will and employment. Neither can do without the other; and the very fact of the increased production in that State, the increased agricultural production to which we have been referred, is the best evidence in the world that the white population and the colored population are in the main getting along on terms of peace and harmony.

Why, sir, to see one of the word-pictures sometimes painted here, and to form an opinion from extracts cut out here and there from newspapers, one would suppose that a perfect state of anarchy exists in the State of Mississippi, and has existed there for years gone by. If so, I crave to know how it is that her agricultural productions have increased from year to year. I crave to know how it is that there has been a migration of colored people to Mississippi and no emigration of colored people from Mississippi of any account? I want to know why it is that colored people have left Alabama and Georgia and Virginia and North Carolina, and gone to Mississippi, if Mississippi is a kind of hell for the colored race, where nothing but a devil could live. No, it will not do at all. These pictures that are displayed before us on the eve of every great election, these one-sided pictures that are executed for party effect, will not do in the face of the fact of a migration to that State of colored population, and of no emigration from it of colored population; of an increase year by year of her agricultural products, and of the fact that general peace and quiet have existed in that State. That there have been outbreaks from time to time, it would be useless to deny. No man deplores them more than I. No man is more opposed than I am to any improper, much less violent, interference with the rights of any citizen of the United States, whether he be black or whether he be white. I am as much opposed to it as anybody. Years ago I said in the Senate, when speaking of the Ku-Klux, that those men were their own worst enemies and the worst enemies of the white people of the South; that their course tended to aggravate and excite the people of the North, so that they were in no condition to deal fairly and kindly toward the people of the South. I denounced them then as enemies of the South, and I denounce to-day as enemies of the South any men who resort to banded violence to deprive citizens of their rights secured to them by their State constitutions or by the Federal Constitution or laws.

These are my feelings about this matter. But because I feel that way, because I know that these men are simply furnishing material with which the opponents of the democratic party are to assail us at the North, by which such intemperate feelings as were exhibited in this debate yesterday by the Senator from Massachusetts are to be reiterated throughout the North, as well as because the thing is wrong in itself, I appeal to every one of those men to obey the law; but I am not willing to condemn them on hearsay and I am not willing to believe in every black picture of the conduct of those men that may be drawn; much less am I willing to go outside of the Constitution and proceed to investigate that which we have no power under the Constitution to remedy.

For these reasons, Mr. President, I shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I rise simply to express the hope that we may now have a vote on the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MERRIMON. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out in the second line of the preamble the words "State officers and members of the Legislature;" so as to read:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi in 1875 for members of Congress was characterized by great frauds, &c.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I had hoped that the Senator from Indiana would not insist upon pressing a vote on this resolution this evening. I desire to submit some remarks upon it, and understand that other gentlemen on this side of the Chamber also desire to speak upon it. I do not wish to trespass on the patience of the Senate, which I know will be exhausted by any long discussion of this subject. I had hoped, therefore, that the Senator from Indiana would have consented that this resolution should go over until Monday. If, however, it shall be the pleasure of the Senate that the debate shall be closed to-night, I propose before the vote is taken to submit some remarks on this question.

I shall not attempt, Mr. President, to discuss the constitutional question involved in this resolution. That has been so ably done by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] who just preceded me, as well as by other gentlemen on this side of the Chamber, that I think it entirely unnecessary to enter into any argument to show that there is a want of constitutional power in the Senate of the United States to do what is proposed to be accomplished by the resolution under consideration. Yet I must be allowed to say that it is a strange doctrine, and to me it is an entirely new doctrine, that the Congress of the United States can directly or indirectly inquire into the manner in which an election for State officers is conducted within the limits of a State. The assumption of such a power on the part of Congress is in my opinion most dangerous and tends to the destruction of that system of local self-government which has heretofore been enjoyed by the people of every State in this Union. And yet that is the assumption of this resolution, that the Congress of the United States may inquire into the manner in which a State election has been conducted within the State of Mississippi. If such a power exist with reference to that State, then it is clear that Congress may inquire into the manner in which elections are conducted in every State of this Union; and if such a power is conceded to Congress all local self-government is practically at an end.

But, sir, I do not propose this evening to discuss the constitutional question, as I before remarked. That has been most ably discussed and the want of power in Congress to make such inquiry demonstrated to the satisfaction, I think, of every Senator who has listened to the arguments on that subject made on this side of the Chamber. That there is no warrant of authority, either in the original Constitution or in the amendments to the Constitution, that will justify Congress in invading the rights of a State by attempting to inquire into or control the election within the States for State officers has heretofore been universally admitted.

But my purpose is not to discuss that question. The object of this resolution is very apparent from the discussion which has taken place in this Chamber, and no effort on the other side of the Chamber can conceal that object. In the first place, one of the objects that inspired the introduction and the pressing of this resolution is to create a public sentiment in the North hostile to the people of the South and to make a political campaign document which is to be used throughout this land in stirring up the feelings of hate toward the people of the South as one of the means whereby the present party in power may be continued the privilege of rioting in the spoils of place. That is evidently one of the objects, if we can infer anything from the tone of debate which has been indulged in in this Chamber.

Another object is to find some possible excuse, some pretense or excuse for the rejection of the Senator-elect from Mississippi when he shall present himself here to take his seat as a member of this body. That, I infer from the tone of the debate, as well as from the language of the resolution and the preamble to the resolution, is one object proposed to be accomplished by this contemplated investigation. What excuse is there for any such inquiry? An election was held in the State of Mississippi last November and that State went democratic. That perhaps was, to the Senator from Indiana, a very unexpected result; certainly it furnished the only ground for his proposed inquiry into the manner in which the election was conducted. The Senator saw here a field which he could glean and from which he could gather perhaps some bloody sheaves that might be used by him in this campaign. The Senator is expert at gleaning and no field is uninviting. Even the barren stubble does not escape him. He puts not to himself the inquiry which the mother-in-law of Ruth put to her on a certain occasion, "Where hast thou gleaned to-day?" but he comes to Congress at every session and every morning during the session with that question somewhat reversed, "Where shall I glean to-day?" Exasperated, perhaps, that this election had gone democratic, the Senator, early in December, introduced his resolution, expecting to reap a rich harvest to be used in the coming presidential canvass.

Now, sir, I do not think that the object proposed will be accomplished. The "bloody shirt" has been flaunted perhaps in other campaigns with effect; but the people of this country are beginning to understand that it is but the old story; that it is but the trite tale that has been told time after time, whenever an election is to come off. They begin to believe that the people of the South are not the desperadoes which they are represented to be; that they are American citizens, peaceful and intelligent, and attached to the Federal Constitution and to the Union of the States; and, whatever credit the story about outrage may have had in other campaigns, my impression is that in that which is to come off this fall it will lose its potency and effect.

But, Mr. President, I must express my regret that any such debate as that which has taken place has been indulged in in the Senate. I regret the introduction of this resolution and I regret the discussion which has followed it. It is not calculated to advance the material interests of this country, it is not calculated to promote the happiness of the people of this country, but it may lead to hatred, to unkind feeling, and to the depression of the material interest of the country.

Sir, it is impossible that prosperity can prevail in this land when there is an evident purpose and effort on the part of one section of this country to array itself in hostility to the other. What the country needs is peace. What the business interests of this country need are repose and confidence; and every effort that is calculated to stir up unkind feelings on the part of the people of one portion of this country against another is adverse to the prosperity of the country and the interests of the people of this country. I regret, therefore, that at this session, when the business interests of the country are prostrate, a measure of this kind, so well calculated to destroy that confidence which alone can build up the industries of this country, should have been introduced, and that a heated debate which has taken place in this Senate, notably yesterday, should have been indulged in in the discussion of this resolution.

I regret, too—and I may be allowed to express the regret—that this Senate Chamber, which should be the theater on which grave questions are discussed, where the members of the body should deliberate on measures to advance the happiness of the people, should be turned into an arena for gladiatorial strife, for party harangues. I regret, too, sir, that the great interests of this country are to be neglected and that this session is to be devoted, or at least a part of this session is to be devoted, to the effort to build up the political fortunes of a distrusted party and the political fortunes of ambitious men.

Sir, in other days this body devoted itself carefully to the business of the country, and then the prosperity of the country was advanced, the peace of the country was promoted, and the happiness of the people was secured; but now, as a presidential election is coming off, this high body is to be converted into a political arena, where strife in debate for the purposes of accomplishing party success and individual ambition is to take the place of the true interests and dignity of the country.

Now, sir, does not the business of this country require our attention? What is the picture to-day held out before the American people? Extravagance and corruption is marking almost every department of the Government. The Senator from Indiana yesterday referred to the investigations in the other House of Congress as party investigations; but the people of this land who love their country more than party, the great body of the American people, are to-day startled by the fact that all over this land extravagance and corruption are undermining the free institutions under which they live; and alarm is justly felt at the revelations that have been made that the money of the people has been wasted, has been squandered in jobs to party favorites; and the people of the country are beginning to realize what they have so often been told by the minority in this Chamber, that the money which was extorted from them by taxation was being used illegally. Sir, liberal institutions throughout the world have had a check by the revelations that have been made in this country, and the note of joy is heard from the lips of those in favor of monarchies and centralized power in Europe because of the revelations here of the extravagance and corruption that have been found to exist. They attribute it to our system; but it is a libel on the American system. It may be true of the administration of government, but it is not true of that form of government established by our fathers, and which it is our highest duty to preserve pure and intact. Not only has corruption and extravagance been found to exist in our land, and which demands our prompt and immediate attention, but every other interest, your financial interests—and I am pleased that the chairman of the Finance Committee of this body is present and listening to my argument—demand the constant, untiring attention of this body until they are put in a better condition. What is the condition of your finances to-day? Your money with which the people of this country buy and sell is now at a depreciation of twelve or fourteen cents on the dollar, and it is to that extent a tax upon every man who uses it. On its face the greenback may bear the impress of the dollar, but when you go to the markets to purchase anything it has not the purchasing power of the dollar; and one of the chief and highest duties of this Congress and of this body is to improve the financial condition and furnish to the people of this country a currency as nearly equal in value to gold as can be done with safety to the business of the country.

Again, your taxing system is oppressive. The people are burdened with taxation, and they need relief, and the efforts of Congress should be directed to the relief of the people from the burdens of taxation under which they suffer to so great an extent. Not only so; every industry in the land is being paralyzed. Go to any part of this country you may, and the industries of the people are languishing. This is true even up in New England. I was informed not long since by a naval officer that in the city of Boston he had enlisted into the marine service of the country excellent mechanics because they were out of employment and could get nothing to do at their trades. I have been told that in Rhode Island, where the whole State is almost engaged in manufacturing, the property of the State is greatly depreciated, that labor is unrewarded or out of employment. So, too, in Pennsylvania, your iron forges are still, or, in their own language, blown out. A large part of them have discharged their hands, and are closed up, and hundreds and thousands of men in that State, so rich in mineral wealth, so rich in everything that constitutes the wealth and greatness of a State, are out of employment, and business is languishing and employers are becoming bankrupt.

So, too, with our commercial interests. Our merchants are failing; they are unable to collect the debts due them, and are unable to meet their own obligations, and they are going down financially. Within the last year over seven thousand cases of bankruptcy occurred in this land. And yet in this condition of things, when the people are looking to this Hall and to the other Hall of Congress for relief, with this state of affairs existing in the country, our attention is not being given to that which would afford the proper relief, but it is interrupted with a discussion upon the question of how the people in the State of Mississippi voted at the last election and the manner in which their election was conducted.

I said, Mr. President, that property was being depreciated all over this land. I believe that in the State in which I live—and I am sure it is as free from embarrassment as any State in the Union—the real property to-day would not sell for more than two-thirds what it would have brought two years ago, and less than half what it would have brought at a period not very remote. Why is this? It is because there is not the proper relief given to the people, because their burdens are not lightened, because this Senate is not giving, in my judgment, that attention to the public business which it ought to give, but takes up the time which ought to be devoted to public affairs in the discussion of a question at least of doubtful right—a question of inquiring in reference to the manner in which an election has been conducted within the State of Mississippi!

Now, Mr. President, is there any pressing necessity for this investigation? Is there any valid reason or excuse why such an investigation should be made? I propose to test that by the remarks of the Senator who introduced this resolution in December last. I looked this morning at the reasons which he assigned for the introduction of the resolution, and I propose to call the attention of the Senate to them. The Senator's first statement was that in the elections of 1869, 1872, and 1873 the republicans carried the State by a large majority; that in 1875 that majority was reversed, and largely reversed. That is the first fact which he states for the justification of the introduction of his resolution; that there had been a change in the political sentiment of the people of Mississippi. Why, sir, there have been at times changes in the political sentiments of the people of every State of this Union. There was a notable change in the political sentiments of the people of Indiana at the time the honorable Senator was elected governor. There have been changes in all the States at times in the political sentiments and in the votes which the people have cast. That certainly can be no valid reason why there should be an inquiry into the manner in which the election in the State of Mississippi was conducted.

Passing on from that, I find the Senator stated as another reason the manner in which the canvass was conducted, and he detailed how the political canvass in Mississippi was conducted, how the democratic party called and held their meetings, how they marched with drum and fife, with banner and with song, from point to point, and held their political meetings and discussed political questions. That is another of the reasons assigned. And then another reason he assigned was "the management on election day;" and he entered into a narration of how the political parties on election day managed their interests. He went into some details. He said:

> In several places cannon were carried near the polling-places, so as to be publicly seen.

That is one of the reasons; he does not urge that anybody was killed, not even that a cannon was fired.

> Small-arms were fired in hearing distance of places where people were voting in one or more counties.

Simply because there was a musket or small-arms of some kind fired within a distance that could be heard, that is another reason why this investigation is to be had!

The Senator says:

> A very general means used to prevent free voting was for democrats, generally white men, to crowd around the voting-places.

That is common in almost every State in this Union. I know that I have struggled time and again to get to the polls to vote in my own town. I have sometimes gone off and waited until there was less pressure, and then deposited my ballot. And yet because there was crowding around the voting-places in Mississippi the Senator from Indiana gravely urges that as one of the reasons why the investigation should be had to ascertain if the election in Mississippi was fair.

Another reason assigned is that democrats made side-remarks, "cursed 'niggers' in an audible, though covert way." So, Mr. President, because some foolish man improperly cursed some negro in an inaudible manner when the poor negro could not hear it, that is made an excuse for the introduction of this resolution and for the investigation which it proposes.

Another point made is that the democrats "eyed the voters with intense expression," and the like. I do not know what the Senator may mean by eyeing voters. I suppose it is looking at them. That is customary, and I know of no power in the Congress of the United States to close the eyes of democrats or of republicans. They will generally use their eyes as they please. There was a time I believe in the history of this country when the attempt was made to lay an embargo on the tongue. Your sedition law did that; and I remember hearing when I was a boy some of the songs that commemorated the assault upon free speech. When persons who were hostile to that sedition law knew that they were out of hearing of their enemies, they would sometimes get together and sing an old ditty:

> Since we may neither speak nor write
> In words that may our betters bite,
> We'll sit mum-chance from morn till night
> And pay them off in thinking, sir.

And I apprehend that, if Congress attempt to regulate the eyes of democrats, they have got a bigger job on hand than they have undertaken heretofore. And yet these are gravely assigned as some of the reasons why this resolution is necessary, why this investigation should go on.

Mr. President, this resolution was introduced because men crowd around the polls and eye voters with intense interest, and because some unthinking man cursed negroes, inaudibly but very improperly, I think! I think it is wrong to curse under any circumstances; just as wrong to curse a negro as anybody else. I am opposed to it as much as the Senator from Indiana; but I do not know of any authority or power in the Congress of the United States to prevent any such wrong.

But how comes the zeal of the Senator from Indiana to be so recently invoked? Have there not been outrages committed upon the people in other States in connection with elections? It was only a few years ago when the military power of this country was sent to the city of New York, and the guns of the Navy of the country were pointed at the city on election day. I have seen the Federal soldiery march to the polls in my own town and charge bayonets upon the persons assembled around the polls. Why was not the zeal of my friend from Indiana invoked to redress the wrongs on the people of Delaware? I know, too, that a military chieftain, the commander of the department in which I lived at the time, made his edict, and prescribed conditions for the voting of the people of my State, an edict which prescribed as a qualification for voting that if any man should challenge the vote of any democrat the democrat should not vote until he took an oath prescribed by this military chieftain; and the whole democratic party of the State of Delaware was disfranchised and driven from the polls because they would not submit to have their right to vote prescribed by a military chieftain. There were but thirteen democratic votes cast within the State. Has the voice of the Indiana Senator attempted to redress the wrongs of the people of Delaware? I can hardly think of that instance without feeling some indignation. That military commander, who lately represented this country at the Court of St. James, and who had to return from his mission to answer charges preferred against him before a committee of the House of Representatives, did a great injustice to the people of my State. I do not say that General Schenck is guilty of having used his official position in London to float the stock of a worthless mining corporation; but I do say here, and I say it in the presence of some of his political friends, that the man who could be capable of treating the people of any State in this Union as General Schenck, while military commander of that department, treated the democratic party of Delaware, is capable not only of floating worthless stock by virtue of his official relations to the Government, but in my opinion he is capable of almost any other crime. Yet with these facts before us, and while it has been known that there has been riot and sometimes bloodshed in your large cities, never until the change in the political sentiment of the people of Mississippi occurred did it enter the mind of the Senator from Indiana or any other Senator on the other side of this Chamber to institute an investigation, or that any power existed in Congress to interfere with the results of elections in the States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator from Delaware allow me to make a motion to adjourn the Senate till to-morrow? ["No!" "No!"]

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn till Monday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; let us finish this to-night. We had better stay here a while longer than come back to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I submit myself to the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Delaware yield for that purpose?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer to go on, as it does not seem to be the general desire to adjourn at present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware has the floor, and declines to yield for that purpose.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate do now adjourn until Monday next at twelve o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that motion in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It may be entertained.

Mr. EDMUNDS. There is a pending question, I believe.

Mr. WHYTE. Is it not in order, with the consent of the Senator from Delaware, to move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Delaware yields for that purpose, the motion may be received.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order when there is another question pending to offer a resolution of that kind?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not when there is a pending motion, except to adjourn.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The pending question is on agreeing to the resolution of the Senator from Indiana.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is exactly what I say; no other motion can be interposed.

Mr. CONKLING. Or a motion to postpone the pending question in order to move to adjourn over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion would be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I make the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Maryland is not in order.

Mr. WHYTE. I move to postpone the consideration of the pending question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is in order. Does the Senator from Delaware yield for that purpose?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware yields to the Senator from Maryland, who moves to postpone the present order.

Mr. MORTON. I hope that will not be done.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to postpone.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 21, noes 24.

Mr. SAULSBURY. As it is apparent that the Senate desire to reach a vote this evening, I will not consume much more of their time; but I cannot close the remarks which I have made without expressing my regret that the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] yesterday saw proper to indulge in such heated remarks in reference to the democratic party, of which I am an humble member. I was exceedingly sorry that that gentleman, who I thought was as a general rule reasonably amiable, saw proper to use toward the democrats of the Senate, and especially the democrats from southern States, remarks which I think were unjust to them, and, I will take occasion to say, unjust to the Senator himself. If I understood his remarks they meant to convey the impression that any man who lived in a southern slave State, a State that had been a slave State, who was brought up where the institution of slavery existed, was not to be believed in his professions of attachment to the Federal Union. If I misunderstood the Senator he will correct me, for I do not wish to do him injustice. That remark, I repeat again, was most unkind and unjust to the people of those States. It was most unkind and unjust to members of this body who reside within the limits of States that were formerly slave-holding States. And, I repeat again, it was most unfortunate for and unjust to the Senator himself. It only indicates a feeling of hatred which I had not supposed lodged in the breast of that Senator. I do not claim to have been brought up under the influences of slavery, yet I lived in a State where slavery existed. I never owned a slave, never desired to own a slave, but I repel the insinuation that gentlemen who reside in slave-holding States are less truthful than gentlemen who were raised in the land of the pilgrims. As a Senator on this floor, having resided in a State where there were a few slaves, I take it upon myself to say that my associations with gentlemen who have been raised in southern States have given me as high an appreciation of their character, not only for veracity but for honor and everything that is manly and noble, as my associations with gentlemen who were not raised in those States.

The Senator did not utter the sentiment of the people of Massachusetts, and I know it. I have met gentlemen from that State; and I read the glowing descriptions of the kindly feelings that were manifested at Lexington and Bunker Hill last year, and I infer from those manifestations that the great body of the people of Massachusetts are friendly and kind in their disposition. They are not to be judged by the remarks of the Senator from Massachusetts who represents them, but they are to be judged by their own acts. They are not to be held responsible for the intemperate remarks of those who have the honor to represent them in this Chamber, but by their own acts are they to be judged; and those acts, let me say, were most honorable and most noble on the occasions to which I refer, when they treated with unusual hospitality the men who had been in battle array against the northern portion of this land. They wanted to see all strife and all discord forever wiped away and hushed. Business men of the country long for peace and prosperity, that their interests may be secured, when industries may be revived and peace and concord may dwell throughout land. It is the duty of Senators, as I believe, not to stir up strife, but to promote by their legislation and by the inculcation of the spirit of reconciliation and peace that concord and harmony which should distinguish the people of this whole land.

I hope, Mr. President, that the time is not far distant when every utterance of passion, when every sentiment of hate and hostility may be hushed, and when the people of the whole land will join in one anthem of praise that the strife of a few years ago has been entirely obliterated and forgotten.

I will not trespass longer upon the attention of the Senate. I would have preferred that this subject should have gone over until Monday, when I might perhaps have given a more extended notice to the resolution under discussion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves to amend the preamble. The question will be first on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Do I understand that we now vote on the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Upon the resolution, not the preamble. Upon that question the yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when Mr. ALLISON's name was called.) I desire to say for my colleague that he is compelled to be absent this afternoon, and that he is paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. EATON.] If the Senator from Connecticut were present he would vote against the resolution, and my colleague [Mr. ALLISON] would vote for it.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I desire to say that I am paired upon this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. DAVIS, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM.] If he were here I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea."

Mr. DAWES, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. ENGLISH.] If he were here I should vote "yea," and he would vote "nay."

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. JOHNSTON's name was called.) I will state that my colleague is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] If present my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] would vote "nay," and the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with my colleague, [Mr. CONOVER.] If he were here I should vote "nay," and he would vote "yea."

Mr. OGLESBY, (when Mr. MCDONALD's name was called.) The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. SHARON] desired me to state that they were both necessarily absent from the Senate this afternoon. If they were here the Senator from Indiana would vote "nay," and the Senator from Nevada would vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. WRIGHT, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. JOHNSTON.] As stated by his colleague, I would vote for this resolution, and the Senator from Virginia would vote against it.

Mr. BOGY, (after having voted in the negative.) I desire to recall my vote. I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. INGALLS. My colleague [Mr. HARVEY] desired me to say that he was necessarily absent from the Chamber and was paired with the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. RANDOLPH.] My colleague would, if present, vote for the resolution, and the Senator from New Jersey against it.

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; which resulted—yeas 29, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Key, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, and Wadleigh—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Booth, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, Whyte, and Withers—19.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, English, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Wallace, West, Windom, and Wright—25.

So the resolution was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment to the preamble offered by the Senator from North Carolina, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORTON. I will ask to have the amendment reported to know what it is proposed to strike out. I do not understand it myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line 2 of the preamble to strike out the words "and State officers and members of the Legislature;" so that, if amended, that portion of the preamble will read:

Whereas it is alleged that the late election in Mississippi (in 1875) for members of Congress was characterized by great frauds committed, &c.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. WRIGHT, (when Mr. ALLISON'S name was called.) I desire to say that the pair of my colleague extends to all these questions, and I shall not announce it again.

Mr. BAYARD answered to his name.

Mr. BOGY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If here, he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. CONKLING. May I make an inquiry? I understand this is an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] accepted the substitute of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Chair will allow me, I understand both Senators are willing to accept this verbal amendment. Why then the necessity of a roll-call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate ordered it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator from Michigan says he is willing, and the Senator from Indiana is willing. They have control of the measure, I take it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has moved to amend the preamble as accepted by the Senator from Indiana. The Senator from Vermont objects to the amendment being accepted, and the Senate has ordered the yeas and nays upon the amendment. Therefore the roll-call must proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. One response has been made.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. One response has been made already, and of course it is beyond the power of any Senator. The Secretary will resume the roll-call.

The Secretary resumed the call of the roll.

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) I consider myself paired upon this question with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay" on this amendment.

Mr. OGLESBY, (when Mr. MCDONALD'S name was called.) Having made one statement in regard to the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] and the Senator from Nevada, [Mr. SHARON,] I suppose it is not necessary for me to repeat it, especially on a question which nobody seems to care anything about.

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

The Secretary concluded the call of the roll; and the result was announced—yeas 16, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kelly, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, and Withers—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, and Windom—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, English, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Wallace, West, Whyte, and Wright—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is upon agreeing to the preamble.

Mr. MERRIMON. Upon that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BOGY, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN.] If he were here he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

Mr. BURNSIDE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. DENNIS.] If he were here he would vote "nay" and I should vote "yea."

Mr. WITHERS, (when Mr. JOHNSTON'S name was called.) My colleague is paired with the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.] If my colleague were present he would vote "nay" and the Senator from Iowa would vote "yea."

Mr. WALLACE, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL.] He would vote "yea" if present and I should vote "nay."

The Secretary having concluded the call of the roll, the result was announced—yeas 27, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Oglesby, Paddock, Robertson, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, and Windom—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Davis, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Norwood, Ransom, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Thurman, and Withers—18.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, English, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Key, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Patterson, Randolph, Sharon, Sherman, Wallace, West, Whyte, and Wright—28.

So the preamble was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask that the bill to provide for a deficiency be taken from the table for reference at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Although the bill on the face of it appears to be an appropriation bill, on examining it I find that it contains legislation in reference to the finances and currency of the country. Therefore it occurs to me that it should go to the Committee on Finance. The Senator from Ohio will know best how that is.

Mr. SHERMAN. So far as the appropriation is concerned, it is a matter for the Appropriation Committee; but there are provisions that ought to be referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The appropriation is simply to provide for a matter of deficiency, rather than otherwise.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Finance:

A bill (H. R. No. 2951) to provide for the separate entry of express packages contained in one importation;

A bill (H. R. No. 1585) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to designate and fix the points at which collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall hold their offices; and

A bill (H. R. No. 522) to define the tax on fermented or malt liquors.

The bill (H. R. No. 1344) directing method of annual estimates of expenditures to be submitted from Navy Department was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer the following order:

Ordered, That James Roberts and Noah Roberts have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their petition and papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has there been an adverse report?

Mr. MERRIMON. There has been an adverse report, but it has not been acted on. The case stands on the Calendar.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The papers ought not to be withdrawn without leaving copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Copies are required to be left, according to the rule.

Mr. MERRIMON. The parties are prosecuting their claim in the House of Representatives, and these are the original papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I cannot help it. If there has been an adverse report, the papers ought not to be withdrawn without copies being left.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. They cannot be withdrawn without copies being left.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask to have the order amended so as to require them to leave copies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be modified in that respect. The order, as modified, will be regarded as agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 31, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CARL G. AND JOHN PALM.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2949) for the relief of Carl G. and John Palm, of Travis County, Texas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WOMAN-SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I am requested to present a memorial from the women-citizens of the United States, asking for a form of government in the District of Columbia which shall secure to its women-citizens the right to vote; and I ask the grace and favor to have their memorial printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I beg the privilege of saying a few words in favor of the request made by the gentleman from New York who presents this memorial. It is a hundred years this day since Mrs. Abigail Adams, of Massachusetts, wrote to her husband, John Adams, then a member of the continental convention, entreating him to give to women the right to protect the rights of women and predicting a general revolution if justice was denied them. Mrs. Adams was one of the noblest women of that period, distinguished by heroism and patriotism never surpassed in any age. She was wife of the second and mother of the sixth President of the United States, and her beneficent influence was felt in political as in social circles. It was perhaps the first demand for the recognition of the rights of her sex made in this country, and is one of the centennial incidents that should be remembered. It came from a good quarter. The memorial represents 400,000 American women. They ask for the organization of a government in the District of Columbia that will recognize their political rights. I voted some years ago to give women the right to vote in this District, and recalling the course of its government I think it would have done no wrong if they had enjoyed political rights.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the memorial be printed without the names.

Mr. COX. There are no names appended except those of the officers of the association; and I hope they will be printed with the memorial.

Mr. HENDEE. I trust the gentleman will allow this petition to be referred to the committee of which I am a member: the Committeee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX. I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Memorial of women-citizens of this nation.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

Whereas the Supreme Court of the United States has re-affirmed the decision of the supreme court of the District of Columbia in the cases of Spencer vs. The Board of Registration and Webster vs. The Judges of Election, and has decided that, "by the operation of the first section of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, women have been advanced to full citizenship and clothed with the capacity to become voters; and further that this first section of the fourteenth amendment does not execute itself, but requires the supervention of legislative power in the exercise of legislative discretion to give it effect; and whereas the Congress of the United States is the legislative body having exclusive jurisdiction over this District of Columbia, and in enfranchising the colored man and refusing to enfranchise any woman, white or colored, made an unjust discrimination against sex, and did not give the intelligence and moral power of the citizens of said District a fair opportunity for expression at the polls; and whereas woman-suffrage is not an experiment, but has had a fair trial in Wyoming, where women vote, where they hold office, where they have the most orderly society of any of the Territories, where the experiment is approved by the executive officers of the United States, by their courts, by their press, and by the people generally, and where it has "rescued that Territory from a state of comparative lawlessness" and rendered it "one of the most orderly in the Union;" and whereas, upon the woman-suffrage amendment to Senate bill No. 44 of the second session of the Forty-third Congress, votes were recorded in favor of woman-suffrage by the two Senators from Florida, the two from Indiana, the two from Michigan, and the two from Rhode Island, one from California, one from Illinois, one from Alabama, one from Arkansas, one from Louisiana, one from Kansas, one from Massachusetts, one from Minnesota, one from Nebraska, one from Nevada, one from Oregon, one from South Carolina, one from Texas, and one from Wisconsin; and whereas a fair trial of equal suffrage for men and women in the District of Columbia, under the immediate supervision of Congress, would demonstrate to the people of the whole country that justice to women is policy for men; and whereas the women-citizens of the United States are governed without their own consent, are denied trial by a jury of their peers, are taxed without representation, and are subject to manifold wrongs resulting from unjust and arbitrary exercise of power over an unrepresented class; and whereas in this centennial year the spirit of '76 is breathing its influence upon the people, melting away all prejudices and animosities and inspiring into our national councils a finer sense of justice and a clearer perception of individual rights: Therefore,

We pray your honorable body to frame a government for the District of Columbia which shall secure to its women-citizens the right to vote.

WAGES AND HOURS OF LABOR.

Mr. CAMPBELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2950) to provide for the appointment of a commission on the subject of wages and hours of labor and the division of profits between labor and capital in the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor, and ordered to be printed.

ENTRY OF EXPRESS PACKAGES.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported as a substitute for House bill No. 1069 a bill (H. R. No. 2951) to provide for the separate entry of express packages contained in one importation; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that a separate entry may be made of one or more express packages contained in an importation of packed packages consigned to one importer or consignee, and concerning which packed packages no invoice or statement of contents or values has been received. Every such entry is to contain a declaration of the whole number of parcels contained in such original packed packages; and shall embrace all the goods, wares, and merchandise imported in one vessel at one time for one and the same actual owner or ultimate consignee.

The second section provides that the importer, consignee, or agent's oath prescribed by section 2841 of the Revised Statutes be modified for the purpose of the act so as to require the importer, consignee, or agent to declare therein that the entry contains an account of all the goods —— imported in the —— whereof —— is master, from —— for account of ——; which oath, so modified, shall in each case be taken on the entry of one or more packages contained in an original package. But nothing in the act is to be construed to relieve the importer, assignee, or agent from producing the oath of the owner or ultimate consignee in every case now required by law, or to provide that importation may consist of less than the whole number of parcels contained in any packed package or packed packages consigned in one vessel at one time to one importer, consignee, or agent.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will explain very briefly the object of this bill. The law governing the entry of merchandise into the ports of the United States, particularly with reference to the special entry to be made in every case, has never been modified or amended since the original act of 1799, which is to be found in section 2785 of the Revised Statutes. A subsequent act, passed in 1823, which will be found in section 2841 of the Revised Statutes, prescribed the form of oath that every owner, consignee, or merchant should take at the custom-house before he could make his entry and receive the necessary permit for the discharge of his goods. By this form of oath, which every person is required to take, he is made to swear that his entry contains all the goods that he imports or of which he is the consignee.

Since the passage of that act, and since the provision of the oath, there has grown up in the country an interest of great magnitude called the European express agencies and companies. Those European express companies are conducted very much upon the same principle as are our domestic express companies. They receive in their agencies in Paris, London, and other parts of Europe a miscellaneous collection of packages addressed to some thousand consignees in the United States, presents from friends traveling abroad, orders for small packages sent through the instrumentality of the express companies and delivered to agents in New York to be distributed to those to whom they belong. Under this form of oath those express companies are obliged to swear the entry they propose to make contains a full statement of the goods they are required to receive. In many such cases there are no invoice, and in others there is no indication of the value or special character of the package to be received. Those companies have recently applied to the Secretary of the Treasury for some relief, but under the law he could not grant them relief. Now, at the request of the Committee of Ways and Means I have drafted a bill which I have been directed to report to the House.

I will have the letter of the Secretary read, and the House will then see, I think, the propriety of passing this bill, to which I believe there can be no objection. It is the letter inclosing the bill we have reported from the committee:

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., February 3, 1876.

SIR: Referring to your letter of the 20th of December, submitting a bill (H. R. No. 1069) "to provide for entry of single packages from a bill of lading," and requesting my "opinion relative to the passage of said bill," I have the honor to state that this Department does not consider that legislation in the form proposed in the bill would be expedient; and that it is somewhat difficult to frame a bill that will meet the object in view, harmonize with existing laws, and afford proper protection to the revenue.

It is suggested, however, that the first section of the bill should be so modified that express companies only can avail themselves of its provisions, and so that the custom-house may be in possession of a complete record of the entire contents of each package to insure payment of duty on all.

The oath prescribed by section 2841 of the Revised Statutes is believed to be of use in the collection of the revenue, and should not be modified as regards all importations in the manner provided for in the bill or further than is required for purposes of the act proposed. The section of the law above cited requires one entry to embrace all goods imported in one vessel at one time for one owner, importer, or consignee, and it is thought that all packages belonging to any one owner should still be included in one entry in such manner as to conform as far as possible to the provisions of the statute.

It appears, further, that the actual owner of the packages entered should take the oath prescribed by the section referred to, which has been in use since the year 1823, and that a modified oath should be taken by the consignee.

The second section of the bill should be changed accordingly.

The Department recommends briefly that a separate entry be allowed; that it be restricted to packed packages; that on each entry a declaration shall be made of the whole number of parcels; that the separate entry shall embrace all packages on the importing vessel owned by one person; that the consignee shall declare that fact; that the owner shall take the usual importer's oath; and that an importation shall not be considered to consist of less than the entire packed package or packages consigned to one person or firm.

A draught of a bill more fully expressing the Department's views is inclosed herewith for your information, which bill, it is believed, will facilitate the business of the express companies without being liable to serious objections.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully,

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

Hon. W. R. MORRISON,
Chairman Committee Ways and Means,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. This is the bill we now report. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WOOD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

TAX ON FERMENTED OR MALT LIQUORS DEFINED.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 522) to define the tax on fermented or malt liquors, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that nothing contained in section 3337 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be so construed as to authorize an assessment upon the quantity of materials used in producing or purchased for the purpose of producing fermented or malt liquors, nor shall the quantity of materials so used or purchased be evidence, for the purpose of taxation, of the quantity of liquor produced; but the tax on all beer, lager-beer, ale, porter, or other similar fermented liquor, brewed or manufactured, and sold or removed for consumption or sale, shall be assessed and paid as provided in section 3339 of said statutes, and not otherwise.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Strike out of line 12 the words "assessed and."
Add to the bill the following proviso:
Provided, That this act shall not apply to cases of fraud.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the bill just reported amends the law taxing fermented liquors; at least, it changes it as interpreted by the Internal-Revenue Office. The law now requires brewers of ale, porter, beer, and like products to keep a book in which shall be entered a daily statement and account of the kind and quantity of liquors produced, the quantity actually sold or removed for consumption and sale, and of all materials, including grain and malt, purchased and used for producing such fermented liquors. The books, statements, and accounts to be kept are to be open and subject to the inspection of all revenue officers and agents. Severe penalties are imposed upon brewers failing to keep and furnish, monthly, the accounts, statements, and books required. And a tax of $1 per barrel of thirty-one gallons is required to be paid on all fermented liquors made and sold, or removed for consumption and sale.

Under these provisions of the law in force, Mr. Douglass, former Commissioner of Internal Revenue, having ascertained that two and one-half bushels of malt was a fair average quantity for producing a barrel of beer of thirty-one gallons, established this average quantity as a basis of taxation by a rule of his Office. Any malt or material used in excess of the quantity fixed by this rule, with all the facts in relation thereto, and the person using the same, were to be reported to the Commissioner that he might judge as to a further assessment based upon such excess; but no assessment was ever made by said Commissioner.

The present Commissioner has given practical effect to this rule; has made, and continues to make, assessments under it; assessments which add but an inconsiderable sum to the revenues while they are vexatious and unjust to the tax-payer.

Had it been intended that such a rule or basis of assessment should be made, doubtless the law would have so provided. Its establishment and the requirement of the payment of taxes in accordance therewith is believed to be arbitrary and not within the purposes of the law. However this may be, it is believed that it is unjust in principle, annoying and vexatious in its execution, and in no wise necessary to the collection of any tax due the Government.

The same tax of $1 per barrel is imposed on ale, porter, and beer. But these are of different strength, and require different quantities of material to produce them, or the same number of gallons of each. And so it is shown that quantity, not strength, was made, and should be made, the basis of taxation. Barrels of thirty-one gallons actually produced, not the strength or quality of the gallons, and not the materials of which the gallons were made, were to be, and should be, taxed. The Commissioner may rightfully make, and it is his duty to make, needful rules for detecting fraud and for collecting a tax imposed by law, but he cannot impose and ought not to be allowed to impose any.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the object of having the grain assessed under the law as it stands was to have a check upon the manufacture and sale of more ale or beer than was actually accounted for, and I believe it has proved, without being of particular value in the way of assessment, a great check upon fraud—perhaps one of the principal checks in the manufactures of this article. I will ask the chairman of the committee whether he has consulted with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue on this subject?

Mr. MORRISON. We have. The Brewers' Association was represented before the committee, and presented their side of the question, and two representatives of the Treasury Department or Bureau of Internal Revenue were also present at the request of the committee, and presented the reasons for the rule fixed as a basis of assessment, and suggested an amendment to the bill, which was regarded as right and proper and which the committee adopted.

The gentleman from Michigan is probably aware that not only are fermented liquors, ale, porter, or beer, though paying the same tax, made of different strength, requiring varied quantities of material to make them, but the malt as well as the grain of which it is made is of different weight and strength, and yields per bushel unlike quantities of the essential ingredients for producing these liquors. Two and one-half bushels of barley grown in California or in Western Canada will equal for beer production three bushels grown in the Northwest and perhaps in many other localities. The same and greater inequality exists in the kinds and grades of malt. The conditions which give and require different strength in the article produced and make necessary different quantities of material in its production are various. It must have more strength to bear transportation. It must be heavier if it is to be stored after transportation or made to bear the changes of climate. But to give more strength and greater weight more material is required. Hence the attempt to fix arbitrarily by law or otherwise the quantity of two and a half bushels of malt for the production of a barrel of beer is to direct the brewer what kind of beer he should make, without reference to the demands of his trade; this is not only unjust, but impracticable.

In many, if not a majority, of the cases where assessments have been made and extra taxes exacted for malt used in excess of two and one-half bushels per barrel produced, the average for the year was less than that quantity, and the excess was claimed by singling out months when a stronger article, requiring more material, was made. And in a case arising in Baltimore, an assessment was made of $14, only for the month of September last, because for that month more than two and a half bushels of malt was used to the barrel produced, while for the year the average quantity used by the brewer so assessed was less than two and a quarter bushels per barrel produced, and upon all of which the tax had been paid. The capital of the country invested in this industry is at least $100,000,000. The yearly revenue derived from this source is $9,000,000. The whole assessments made under the ruling complained of amount to $7,577, or only one-tenth of 1 per cent. of the revenue so derived. And under this ruling assessments have been made as low as a single dollar, because more than two and a half bushels of malt had been used to the barrel of beer produced, and this, too, against brewers who had paid their taxes, produced their books, made their statements, and rendered their accounts under oath, on the assumption of the Commissioner that all these were false and fraudulent. No tax has been more cheerfully borne or more promptly paid than that imposed upon the manufacturers of fermented liquors. No reason is believed to exist why they should be longer subjected to these vexations and exactions. The bill under consideration rights this wrong; and requires payment of taxes on all beer actually produced; no more. No statement, account, or book now required is dispensed with. All the means for preventing fraud remain. But the brewer, having made, kept, and produced his statements, accounts, and books, is not to be presumed to have committed fraud. This is in accord with the spirit of our laws and with substantial justice.

Mr. CONGER. Now, Mr. Speaker, one of the results of this law has been to make it an object with brewers to use a better article of malt or of barley for their malt. The repeal of this law leaves all classes and all grades to be treated in exactly the same manner. I do not know but this may be a proper amendment. I am not sufficiently familiar with it to express a positive opinion, but I think the protection of the Government on the one hand, and the protection of the producers of a better article of barley and a better article of malt on the other, are both subserved by the present law.

There is another point to which I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee. It is that the malt made by the brewer is now accounted for, charged and paid for, whether he uses it himself or sells it to some other person. In many places a large quantity of malt is sold by the brewer to private brewers, to families who make their own beer and who never account for it to the Government at all; but with this provision of law the Government received its assessment on the malt manufactured from the barley. Remove this, and there is no limit on the amount of the malt that might be made at the brewery and manufactured at private establishments which the assessments of the Government do not reach at all. I think the effect of it would be injurious to the revenues of the Government and injurious to those who would encourage the production of a better class of barley.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the reading of the bill.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. BURCHARD.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I yield for a moment until the bill has been again reported.

The bill was again read.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The present bill does not dispense with any of the requirements of the law, in regard to keeping an account, as to the amount of material used by the brewers. It simply provides that the amount of material, or it is the intention of the law to provide that the amount of material shall not be the guide as to the amount of tax to be paid, except in cases where it is the intention and purpose to evade the law. It is based upon the theory that the intention of the law is to tax the actual amount produced, and the report as to the amount of material used is simply for the purpose of having a check upon the production of these liquors; so that in case there is a much larger quantity produced than would probably be produced from the malt actually used, it might lead the Department to investigate.

Now, all that is retained in the present law, and under the amendment proposed by the committee the bill gives the power in cases of fraud to assess the brewer upon the material that he has used. In cases where there have been these small assessments of a quarter dollar or a half dollar a month it has been a great annoyance, because it is impossible, as was stated by the chairman of the committee, and as must be evident to gentlemen, to get the same amount or a given amount from even the same class of malt. One brewer who is skilled in the business will produce much more than another brewer from the same barley. Then there is a great difference in the qualities of the barley. So that in some cases, where the brewer has been unskillful, or where he has used very poor material, that is as regards the amount of beer that can be produced from it, he has had to pay an assessment of a small amount.

Out of over $8,000,000 of tax paid by the brewers in the last year, these assessments have only amounted to $7,000; less than a dollar in one thousand, and all paid in these small sums. The committee therefore have felt that there was some grievance and some hardship in this, and thought we could protect the revenue by passing the bill with the amendment reported, so as to relieve those engaged in the production of beer from this grievance.

Mr. MORRISON. I yield for a moment to the author of the bill, the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. KEHR.]

Mr. KEHR. It will be remembered that fermented liquors pay a tax of $1 for every barrel of thirty-one gallons. The law taxes the product, not the material that enters into the product; but under the provision of section 3337, which requires the brewer to keep "an account of all materials by him purchased for the purpose of producing fermented liquors," the Commissioner of Internal Revenue claims the power to determine the quantity of malt which produces a barrel of beer, and to assess the brewer upon the quantity used in excess of the standard thus adopted. It is not claimed even by the Commissioner that the right to fix the standard is given him by the express terms of the law, but he deduces it as an implication from the duty imposed upon the brewer of keeping a material-book, or to state the proposition more distinctly, the law does not fix the quantity of malt to be used in producing a barrel of beer, but the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has, by construction, interpolated into the law a provision authorizing him to fix it; and in the exercise of a power thus assumed he has established an inflexible rule, applicable to all seasons of the year and to all parts of the country, allowing but two and a half bushels of malt to be used in the production of a barrel of beer or ale of thirty-one gallons, and assessing the brewer upon the excess used for the number of barrels, such excess would produce at the rate so fixed, and this rate is made the basis for monthly assessments.

The correctness of the Commissioner's interpretation of the statute and of the rate established by him has always been absolutely and stoutly denied by the brewing interest, and the enforcement of the rate has been a source of great vexation and annoyance to brewers throughout the United States without any corresponding benefit to the Government, and threatens litigation exceeding a hundred-fold in expense the amount of revenue annually derived from it. In this connection I beg gentlemen to remember that the tax derived by the Government of the United States from fermented liquors during the last fiscal year, according to the Commissioner's report, was $9,144,004.41; whereas the sum assessed under the interpretation and rule to which I have alluded, on the excess of malt used, amounted, as I am credibly informed, in the aggregate, to only about $7,500, distributed among many brewers, and wrung in each instance from an indignant taxpayer who paid the pittance under protest, believing its exaction to be in violation of his rights and an imputation upon his honesty and honor.

The bill under consideration is simply declaratory of what the law is now believed to be, but made necessary in view of the facts I have mentioned. Its object is to relieve the brewing interest of the embarrassment to which the action of the Commissioner has subjected it, and to guard against a continuance of that action, which is believed to be not only without the sanction of law, but to be founded also in a misconception of fact. In establishing the rule that the purchase, for brewing purposes, of every two and a half bushels of malt subjects the brewer to the payment of the tax assessed upon a barrel of malt liquor, the Commissioner ignores the fact that the product depends on the quantity of saccharine matter contained in the malt, which varies probably with every bushel of malt used, depending on the age of the barley, the season of the year, the place of its growth, the fact being that there is a difference of five pounds in weight between barley raised in Canada and on the Pacific slope and that grown in the Western States. The rule, moreover, ignores the fact that any casualty intervening during the process of malting arrests the development of the saccharine properties of the barley, hence rendering the use of a larger quantity of malt necessary; and furthermore, that in manufacturing malt liquor sufficiently strong to bear transportation and change of climate, a larger quantity of malt is required than in producing an article for immediate home consumption. The effect of the rule is to impose a penalty, in the shape of an additional tax, on the manufacturer who, at an increased expense to himself, places a superior article on the market, whereas it secures no deduction to the brewer who uses less than the standard quantity.

This bill releases no safeguard now provided for the faithful collection of the tax. The duty of keeping the material-book is retained; all the purposes originally had in view in prescribing that duty are preserved, and the object aimed at is solely and singly to prevent a perversion of the law, by which the sworn statements of honorable men from whom the Government annually collects a large revenue, and with whom it has at no time encountered difficulty in the collection of its revenue, are rejected upon an arbitrary rule founded upon an erroneous assumption of fact.

In reply to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] I may add that the effect of the Commissioner's rule is to discriminate against barley grown in the Northwestern States of the Union and in favor of Canada barley, because the latter being heavier than the former, a smaller quantity of it produces a barrel of beer; whereas the pending bill, if adopted, removes the motive for such discrimination on the part of the brewer.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to yield to me for a few moments.

Mr. MORRISON. I will do so.

Mr. PAGE. I am in favor of the passage of this bill. When the original law was passed it was never intended that a construction should be given to it such as has been given by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. MORRISON] has referred to the quality of the barley produced in California. My attention last summer was called by the brewers in the city of Sacramento, the city of San Francisco, and other places in California to the fact that, notwithstanding the quality of the barley produced there, it was impossible for the brewers to manufacture a barrel of beer from two and a half bushels of malt, as provided in the regulations of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. I believe this bill should pass. In my judgment it certainly recommends itself to the Representatives of the people, from the fact that by the passage of this bill the brewers will be assessed upon the amount of beer manufactured, and not upon the quantity of malt from which the beer is obtained.

Mr. BANNING. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] to yield to me for two or three minutes.

Mr. MORRISON. I will do so.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I hope the bill reported by the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, now under consideration, for the relief of the beer-brewers will be passed to a law.

Under the statute as it now is, beer-brewers are required to pay $1 tax upon each barrel of beer of not more than thirty gallons. They are also required to make sworn returns of the amount of grain used. Under this rule two thousand seven hundred and eighty-three beer-brewers have been paying an annual revenue for the support of the Government of more than $9,000,000. Of this amount more than $400,000 is paid by the brewers of Cincinnati.

The Revenue Department, not satisfied with this rule fixed by Congress, has, without authority of law, made an arbitrary rule of its own, that two bushels and one-half of malt are sufficient to make a barrel of beer, and that for all malt used in excess of that quantity it shall be presumed that beer has been brewed in that proportion, and in pursuance with this regulation taxes have been assessed against many of the leading brewers of the country.

That this rule is wrong, unjust, and ought not to be enforced, is shown in the fact that grain or malt used by brewers varies in price, according to quality, from sixty-eight cents a bushel to $1.58. The rule is wrong also because it discriminates against barley raised in the United States. Good barley is raised in New England, parts of Iowa, Pennsylvania, and Minnesota. The cheaper grain is grown on the low, rich lands of Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, while the best No. 1 barley is raised in Canada. The best grain produces the most beer to the bushel. While all good brewers can make a barrel of beer from two and one-half bushels of the best Canada malt or barley, no brewer can make as much or one-half as much beer of the same strength and quality from the poorest malt, such as can be purchased in market for one-third the amount paid for best Canada malt.

Again, barley varies in quality, according to the season. Some years the grain will be first-class, (No. 1, as dealers say;) another year it will be indifferent in quality, below the standard, and will therefore produce less beer to the bushel.

Again, if the brewer uses grape-sugar, corn-meal, or other articles of like character in manufacturing beer, he will use a less quantity of grain.

Again, no two brewers will or can produce exactly the same amount of beer from the same amount of the same quality of grain. The amount produced will vary according to the strength of the beer and the experience, knowledge, and cunning of the brewer. There is no fixed standard of strength for beer, and the quantity produced from a bushel of malt varies according to the strength of the beer made. Beer manufactured for shipment to different parts of the country is generally made stronger than beer manufactured for home consumption, and requires more malt.

Thus I think it fully appears that the rule of the Department is wrong, and should be remedied by the passage of the bill now under consideration.

The men for whose relief it is asked are honest, patriotic citizens, who pay large revenues into the Treasury; who are not charged or even suspected of any fraud, whose books are always open to inspection, and who invite the most rigid scrutiny of Government officers into all their operations.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. MORRISON] a question.

Mr. MORRISON. Very well.

Mr. HARRISON. If I understand it rightly, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has determined that the fact of there being more malt than two and a half bushels used in the manufacture of a barrel of beer is an evidence of fraud. Does not the amendment which the committee have attached to this bill allow the Commissioner to still continue that construction?

Mr. MORRISON. It does not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire a moment or two to say that if the effect of this bill will be to levy a tax on the amount of beer manufactured by reducing the tax on each bushel of barley and thus induce brewers to import, to a greater extent than they now do, a better class of barley, it will be deleterious to the interests of the growers of barley in the United States. We now import six million dollars' worth of barley every year.

I do not want to see any change in our laws that will induce our brewers to import a larger quantity of barley. There are some reasons why up to this time the farmers of the Northwest have not succeeded in raising a class of barley suitable to the wants of the brewers. The Agricultural Department has imported from England one thousand bushels of barley this year for the purpose of giving better seed to farmers and eventually filling this want.

Now, I believe we ought to have a larger tax on foreign barley; that we ought to discourage to as great an extent as possible the importation of barley for making these malt liquors.

Mr. MORRISON. I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHARLES E. HOVEY.

Mr. GARFIELD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, without amendment and with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 575) for the relief of Charles E. Hovey.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay to Charles E. Hovey, out of moneys collected by said Hovey, under an alleged contract with the Secretary of the Treasury dated January 6, 1873, such sum as in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury is sufficient to re-imburse said Hovey for expenses incurred and to compensate him for information given and services performed, not to exceed the moiety of the moneys so collected: Provided, That if said funds have been covered into the Treasury, payment may be made out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. GARFIELD. There is a report of the Senate accompanying this bill. I will not ask to have it read, but I will ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

There was no objection; and the report is as follows:

The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Charles E. Hovey, of Washington, District of Columbia, having had the same under consideration, report:

That on the 18th of July, 1872, Mr. Hovey made an offer to furnish evidence to enable the Treasury Department to collect certain duties due from the Mobile and Ohio Railroad on iron imported by said company, and landed at Mobile, Alabama, prior to the late war, (which had become derelict, and which ought to come to the United States,) in consideration of receiving one moiety of the net proceeds recovered.

After careful consideration into the case and consultation with the Solicitor of the Treasury, the then Secretary of the Treasury, Hon. GEORGE S. BOUTWELL, finding that the Government had insufficient evidence with which to successfully prosecute the suit, entered into a contract with Mr. Hovey, January 6, 1873, whereby, contingent upon securing to the United States the above-mentioned duties, Hovey was to receive one moiety of the amount recovered, said moiety to include all expenses incurred.

Prior to the making of the above contract, suit had been entered in the circuit court of the United States for the southern district of Alabama (November 30, 1872) for the recovery of these alleged import dues, but subsequent to said contract, (January 27, 1873,) and before Hovey had furnished the evidence agreed, the suit was, by order of the Attorney-General, dismissed for want of sufficient evidence.

On the 3d and 11th of July, 1873, Mr. Hovey furnished the Solicitor of the Treasury with certain facts and evidence; and on the 23d of March, 1874, suit was again instituted in the above-named court, and pressed by Mr. Hovey.

After being continued from term to term at the instance of defendants, the case was finally compromised by the present Secretary of the Treasury, the railroad company paying into the Treasury the sum of $22,564.80 in coin, and the case was dismissed.

The Treasury Department, on the 15th of February, 1875, declined to pay the moiety as stipulated, on the ground that the "subject-matter of the agreement is not within the letter or spirit of the law." The law referred to is as follows:

Joint resolution to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to collect wrecked and abandoned property, derelict claims, and dues belonging to the United States.

Be it resolved, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make such contracts and provisions as he may deem most advantageous for the interests of the Government for the preservation, sale, or collection of any property, or the proceeds thereof, which may have been wrecked, abandoned, or become derelict, being within the jurisdiction of the United States, and which ought to come to the United States; or any moneys, dues, and other interests lately in the possession of or due to the so-called Confederate States, or their agents, and now belonging to the United States, which are now withheld or retained by any person, corporation, or municipality whatever, and which ought to have come into the possession and custody of, or been collected or received by, the United States; and in such contracts to allow such compensation to any person giving information thereof, or who shall actually preserve, collect, surrender, or pay over the same, as the Secretary of the Treasury may deem just and reasonable: Provided, &c. (16 Statutes, page 380)

On the 11th of May, 1875, Hovey asked a reconsideration of Department's decision, and the case was referred to Assistant Secretary Burnam, who reported as follows:

In re C. E. Hovey:

A careful investigation of this case satisfies me that the contract entered into by Secretary BOUTWELL with Hovey January 6, 1873, followed up by the acquiescence of Secretary Richardson, should not be disregarded. As the legitimate result of that contract, there is now under the control of the Department, but not covered into the Treasury, the sum of $22,564.80, and which was secured by the personal services of the claimant, besides, as he swears, an expenditure from his own means of $2,360. I know no principle of law or equity which can justify the Government in availing itself of Hovey's labors and outlays of money in its service, and reaping the large fruits thereof, and then turning him off without remuneration.

His brief upon the point of the proper construction of the joint resolution of Congress of the 21st of June, 1870, is submitted herewith without addition. It is not only forcible, but I deem it unanswerable, certainly by me.

In conclusion, I recommend that the contract between Hovey and the Department be upheld; that he be paid out of the funds collected from the Mobile and Ohio Railroad Company the percentage promised him under the contract, and that the residue be covered into the Treasury.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully,

C. F. BURNAM,
Assistant Secretary.

NOVEMBER 10, 1875.

This decision the Secretary indorsed as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, November 16, 1875.

I am unable to concur in the opinion of the Assistant Secretary. It may be that the party has rendered services for which he should be paid, but I am aware of no act of Congress which authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to make payment under this alleged contract.

B. H. BRISTOW,
Secretary.

In view of the foregoing facts, shown by the papers on file, the committee have some doubt whether, by the strict terms of the statute, the Secretary of the Treasury had power to make the contract referred to; but it is plain that Mr. Hovey rendered services under the contract, and incurred expenses for which he ought to be re-imbursed. Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OFFICES OF COLLECTORS AND SUPERVISORS OF INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. TUCKER, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1585) to authorize the Commissioner of Internal Revenue to designate and fix the points at which collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall hold their offices.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be, and he is hereby, authorized to designate and fix the points at which the collectors and supervisors of the revenue shall establish and maintain their several offices within their respective districts.

Mr. TUCKER. Under the law as it exists at present the officers referred to in this bill have the right of selecting the places for their own offices, which is sometimes very inconvenient to the people who have business with them. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue has recommended the passage of such a bill as the committee have now reported on favorably. I ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TUCKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HAWAIIAN TREATY.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. I desire to ask unanimous consent of the House to fix some time for the final disposition of the bill in relation to the treaty with the Hawaiian government. The bill was the special order from day to day, but for various reasons, and among them my own sickness, it has gone over indefinitely. The discussion is nearly finished; after one or two more speeches we shall be prepared to submit the bill to the House for a final vote. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be made the special order for Thursday next after the morning hour.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour commences at one o'clock and five minutes, and the regular order to-day is the calling of committees for reports of a private nature; the call rests with the Committee on Patents.

STEPHEN V. BENÉT.

Mr. SAMPSON, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2952) authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to rehear the application of Stephen V. Benét for a patent for cartridges; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Commissioner of Patents to revive the application of Stephen V. Benét for a patent for an improved cartridge, dated April, 1866, and hear and determine the application in the same manner as if two years had not elapsed since the last action of the Office thereon; and to grant letters-patent upon the application, if the invention therein described and claimed is found to be novel and patentable. But no person is to be held responsible in damages for the manufacture, sale, or use of such cartridges prior to the issue of the patent; and the subsequent sale of those manufactured at the time of the issue is not to be held to be an infringement of the patent. The Government is to be entitled to the free use of the patent for the military service.

Mr. SAMPSON. Unless it is the desire of some gentleman that the report may be read, I will not ask its reading.

Mr. FORT. It had better be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of S. V. Benét, praying the passage of an act authorizing the Commissioner of Patents to reconsider his rejected application for a patent on an improvement in the manufacture of metallic cartridges, beg leave to submit the following report:

In 1866 General Benét, then of the rank of brevet lieutenant-colonel, United States Army, was in command of the United States arsenal at Frankford, near Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, and was charged in his official capacity with the manufacture for the use of the military service of metallic cartridges; and while thus employed designed an improvement therein, which he believed to be entirely novel and of sufficient importance to justify him in applying for a patent therefor; and, April 14, 1866, made such application in the manner prescribed by law.

On the 27th of the same month his application was rejected on the ground that there was no essential novelty in the invention. March 7, 1867, the specifications were amended, as the law permitted, and again submitted for re-examination, and was on the 14th of March again rejected by the primary examiner for the same reason as before.

General Benét has long been in the Ordnance Department, is now Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, has had great experience and the best opportunities for acquiring information on the subject of the manufacture of cartridges; and with this knowledge, entitling his opinions to some consideration, expresses in his petition the belief "that in the state of the art in this country," at the time of filing his application, "the importance of what appeared to be but slight alterations of form in his device was scarcely appreciated by practical experts and those skilled in the art, not to mention those by whose theoretical knowledge only the ministerial actions in the Patent Office in respect to his application for a patent were determined; and that therefore his application for a patent was mistakenly rejected." And your committee are not prepared to say that such was not the case.

If petitioner was in fact the inventor of an important and valuable improvement in this art, and has been mistakenly deprived of the honor and benefit of his invention—and on these points there is no doubt a correct decision may be now obtained, if permitted a re-examination and to prosecute the appeals allowed by law which before were not taken—then assuredly he ought to have the privilege, at least, of making the attempt to have such mistake corrected, unless some valid reason can be urged against it.

If in consequence of his official position his relations to the Government or the public were such that a patent ought not to be granted, or from his own laches in failing to avail himself of the facilities which the law afforded him to secure a correct determination of his application he is not entitled to consideration; or the granting a patent now, if entitled to one, should work injustice to others, then the relief he is now seeking should not be given.

The fact that he was an officer in the Army will not, of itself, deprive him of the right to his invention. The law of Congress enacted in pursuance of the power given in the Constitution to secure to inventors for a limited time the exclusive right to their discoveries provides that any person who has invented or discovered any new and useful art, machine, manufacture, &c., or improvement thereon, may, by application in the manner prescribed by law, obtain a patent therefor, except officers and employés in the Patent Office; and the question has been decided by the Supreme Court in the case of the United States vs. Burns, 12 Wallace, 246. Mr. Justice Field uses this language:

"If an officer in the military service, not specially employed to make experiments with a view to suggest improvements in arms, tents, or any other kind of war material, he is entitled to the benefit of it, and to letters-patent for the improvement from the United States equally with every other citizen not engaged in such service; and the Government cannot after the patent is issued make use of the improvement any more than a private individual without license from the inventor or making compensation to him."

It is therefore settled that an officer of the Army may be entitled to a patent for the invention of an improvement in the materials of war, and even the Government liable for its use after patent granted.

But if the officer be assigned to the especial duty of experimenting and making improvements in the particular materials to which his invention relates, then it would seem a somewhat different rule should apply. In such case he is the servant of the Government assigned by its command to do for the good of the service just what he has done, and the Government should not, because he has accomplished what he was assigned to do for its benefit, be deprived of this benefit; and this principle is recognized by the petitioner himself. He has offered in his petition to release to the Government all right to royalty or compensation for Government use of the invention.

But the further question is, Should an invention wrought out under such circumstances inure not only to the Government, but to the benefit of all individual citizens of the entire country? True, he was the servant of the people, educated perhaps at their expense, was in their employ, and paid out of their Treasury. But what was the extent of that employment? It was only for governmental purposes. His duty was to make the improvement for the military service; and outside of that the products of his brain and his hands were as much his own property as the fruits of the labor of any other citizen now in the service of the Government would be his. But if it was all the Government's, should we not possess the grace to surrender to him so much of the right as we do not desire to use ourselves? He has well said in his argument before the committee, he was employed to invent a cartridge for the military service of his own Government, not for individuals for sporting purposes, nor for foreign governments or the world at large.

The next inquiry is, Has he reasonable excuse for not prosecuting his application to the court of last resort? When his claim had been rejected the second time by the primary examiner, he might have appealed to the board of examiners-in-chief, thence to the Commissioner, thence to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, and on refusal there, filed his bill in equity, had a hearing before a district or circuit court of the United States, and if error was committed there, gone to the Supreme Court. This he failed to attempt to do until too late. At the time of the rejection of his application, there was no limitation as now, by section 4894 of the revision, that upon failure for three years after any action therein, of which notice was given, to prosecute the application, it should be regarded as abandoned; but cases might be, and were sometimes, taken up again even eight or ten years after rejection. The rejection was in 1867, when there was no limitation. In 1869 he was ordered from Frankford arsenal to other important duties. July 8, 1870, this law of limitation was enacted, and gave only six months in which to resume the prosecution of rejected claims. In the engrossing cares of his official duties this did not come under his observation until he undertook to renew the prosecution at the Patent Office, and was informed it was too late. In the judgment of the committee, those circumstances do show a reasonable excuse for failing to prosecute.

The remaining objection which might be urged is this: Several years have expired since the invention and application. The cartridge has been extensively manufactured and gone into quite general use. Should the public now be deprived of the use of that which it has long enjoyed, which it has supposed was public property, free and open alike to all, or pay a license or royalty therefor? If through his misfortune, occasioned by change of the law, the public has enjoyed for several years free for what otherwise it would have had to pay a royalty, and all the present existing rights can be protected, then this can be no valid argument why he should not be permitted for a limited time in the future to enjoy some benefits from the fruits of his own invention. And these existing rights are carefully protected by the bill.

Your committee therefore submit the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. FORT. I have no doubt that the words "military service" in the latter section of the bill would include also the naval service, but I would ask the gentleman reporting the bill whether he would have any objection to an amendment to insert the words "or naval" after the word "military."

Mr. SAMPSON. There is no objection to that. It is what was intended.

Mr. FORT. Technically it might be claimed that the language did not include the naval service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the verbal amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois? The Chair hears none; and the bill will be so amended.

Mr. SAMPSON. Unless some gentleman desires to discuss the bill, I ask that the question be taken on ordering it to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being taken on the passage of the bill, there were—ayes 37, noes 43.

Tellers were called for.

Mr. CONGER. There having been no opposition made to this bill in debate and the committee having anticipated no objection, it was supposed there was none. But if any gentleman desires to discuss it or does not understand it to be a perfectly proper bill, we will ask its reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. SAMPSON. If this report could be printed, so that gentlemen could have an opportunity to examine the case and become thoroughly acquainted with it, I am satisfied there would be no opposition to the measure. I therefore ask unanimous consent that the bill may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. O'BRIEN. There ought to be no objection to that.

Mr. COX. I object. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] said, as I understood, that there was no objection to this bill——

Mr. CONGER. I said no objection had been made to it here.

Mr. COX. Well, many of us vote on a general principle against the extension of patents.

Mr. CONGER. There has been no patent issued in this case.

Mr. SAMPSON. This is not an extension of a patent. No patent has ever been granted in this case. The bill proposes simply that this inventor shall be authorized to prosecute his application for a patent.

Mr. COX. There ought to be a general statute to cover cases of this kind.

The SPEAKER. The vote has been taken on the passage of the bill, but it has not been announced except informally; and then a demand for tellers was made, so that the parliamentary effect of the motion is suspended and the motion to recommit is now in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I make the motion to recommit the bill, and I will give my reasons for doing so. The individual making this application is an ordnance officer; and I do not think that an officer of the United States should be given an advantage in the respect provided for in this bill. I think that the Government of the United States is entitled to all his intellect while he is in its service. I am also apprised—perhaps not correctly, but I give the information as I receive it—that the Department has three times rejected this application.

Mr. SAMPSON. That is a mistake.

Mr. RANDALL. How many times has it been rejected?

Mr. SAMPSON. This application was twice rejected, but only by a primary examiner. It has never been examined by the board of examiners-in-chief.

Mr. HALE. I hope there will be no objection to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to recommit the bill.

Mr. CONGER. I ask the gentleman to change his motion so as to refer the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir; I would like to have it go again to the Committee on Patents, in order that the objections which have been raised may be considered.

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman had heard the report read, he would have found that it treats almost exclusively of the very point which he makes.

Mr. RANDALL. I only want to have a full understanding of the bill, so that we may vote intelligently upon it.

Mr. CONGER. We can do that in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I have no objection to that.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I was about to make that motion, that the bill be placed on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

TUCSON, ARIZONA, A PORT OF ENTRY.

Mr. PIERCE. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (H. R. No. 360) to establish a port of entry for the collection of duties on imports at Tucson, Arizona Territory.

The SPEAKER. That report cannot be received to-day, as it is a public, and not a private, bill.

CHANGE OF NAME OF PLEASURE-YACHT.

Mr. PIERCE, from the Committee on Commerce, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 1823) to change the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella to that of Myra, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, provides that the name of the pleasure-yacht Ella, registered in the southern district of New York, be, and the same is hereby, changed to Myra; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to grant a register in accordance therewith.

The SPEAKER. As this relates to a vessel entirely private in its use it will be regarded as a private bill.

Mr. COX. I should like to hear some reason for the passage of this bill. There is a general law on the subject, and I believe we are running too much into special legislation.

Mr. PIERCE. Under the law this name cannot be changed except by a special act of Congress. This yacht belongs to a private individual who runs it for his own pleasure and he desires to have the name changed. We all know that yachts are fancy affairs run for private pleasure and I do not see why this gentleman should not be gratified in having the name changed as he desires.

Mr. COX. What is the matter with the old name, "Ella?" [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. He may want to have it changed to the name of his second wife. [Laughter.]

Mr. PIERCE. The gentleman who desires the name of the yacht changed is a citizen of New York.

Mr. ELY. It is all right; I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. COX. This sort of special law is not to be favored unless some good reason can be given. Because a man likes a particular name or a particular female it does not follow that he should come to the American Congress and take up our time in changing the name of some little pleasure-yacht. That is my point.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask my friend from New York how far those motives affected him when he took up two or three hours of the last session in getting the name of a private yacht changed? [Laughter.]

Mr. COX. I know to what the gentleman refers.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether a new revelation may not have come to him.

Mr. COX. The gentleman from Michigan always gets the cart before the horse. I moved to change the name of this vessel from William M. Tweed to Industry. [Laughter.] He seems to have got the idea there was nothing wrong about Mr. Tweed, and I should not have changed it. There was a general dissatisfaction with that name in New York City not limited to any party. I cannot see there is anything wrong in the name of this female. I believe Ella is a very beautiful name.

Mr. PIERCE. Congress has thought wise not to pass a general law for changing the name of these vessels, providing that each and every case shall come to Congress. I know during the last Congress requests of this character coming from the committee were granted. I trust the gentleman may have the privilege he asks of changing the name of his pleasure-yacht from one name to another.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PIERCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER.

Mr. KEHR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to report back a bill (H. R. No. 2689) authorizing the construction of a bridge at Sioux City, Iowa, and I would like to know whether it can be considered a private bill, and therefore in order to-day?

The SPEAKER. Is the authority proposed to be given to an existing corporation?

Mr. KEHR. It is.

The SPEAKER. Then, in the judgment of the Chair, it is a private bill. Does the bill propose to erect a bridge across one of the streams declared to be a public highway?

Mr. KEHR. It is a bridge to be constructed across a navigable river.

The SPEAKER. What river?

Mr. KEHR. The Missouri River at Sioux City. The purpose of the bill is to authorize the Sioux City Bridge Company, under the general law of the State of Iowa, to construct this bridge.

The SPEAKER. If that be all, the Chair will consider it as a private bill.

Mr. KEHR. I am instructed to report the bill back with an amendment.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That it shall be lawful for the Sioux City Bridge Company, a corporation organized for that purpose under the general corporation laws of the State of Iowa, or its assigns, to construct, under and subject to the conditions and limitations hereinafter provided, a bridge across the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, Iowa, and lay on and over said bridge railway-tracks, for the more perfect connection of any and all railways that now are, or which may hereafter be, constructed to the Missouri River at or near Sioux City, or to the river on the opposite side of the same near Sioux City, and build, erect, and lay on and over said bridge ways for wagons, vehicles of all kinds, and for the transit of animals, and to provide ways for foot-passengers, and to keep up and maintain and operate said bridge for the purposes aforesaid; and that, when said bridge is constructed, all trains of all railroads terminating at said river, and on the opposite side thereof, at or near Sioux City, Iowa, shall be allowed to cross said bridge for reasonable compensation, to be made to the owners of the same, under the limitations and conditions hereinafter named. The owners of said bridge may also charge and receive reasonable compensation or tolls for the transit over said bridge of all wagons, carriages, vehicles, animals, and foot-passengers: Provided, That Congress may at any time prescribe such rules, regulations, and rates of toll for transit and transportation over said bridge as may be deemed proper, just, and reasonable.

SEC. 2. That any bridge built under the provisions of this act may, at the option of the person or persons or corporation building the same, be built as a draw-bridge, with a pivot or other form of draw or with unbroken or continuous spans: Provided, That if the same shall be made of unbroken continuous spans it shall not be, in any case, of less elevation than fifty feet above extreme high-water mark, as understood at the point of location, to the lowest part of the superstructure, with straight girders, nor shall the spans of said bridge be less than three hundred feet in the clear at low-water mark; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river; and the main span shall be over the main channel of the river: And provided also, That if a bridge shall be built under this act as a draw-bridge the same shall be constructed as a pivot draw-bridge, with a draw over the main channel of the river at an accessible and navigable point, and with spans of not less than one hundred and sixty feet in length in the clear on each side of the central or pivot pier of the draw; and the next adjoining spans to the draw shall not be less than two hundred and fifty feet; and said spans shall not be less than ten feet above extreme high-water mark, measuring to the lowest part of the superstructure of the bridge; and the piers of said bridge shall be parallel with the current of the river: And provided also, That said draw shall be opened promptly upon reasonable signal, without unnecessary delay: And provided further, That the corporation building said bridge may, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, enter upon the banks of said river, either above or below the point of location of said bridge, and confine the flow of the water to a permanent channel, and to do whatever may be necessary to accomplish said objects, but shall not impede or obstruct the navigation of said river, and shall be liable in damages for all injuries to private property; and all plans for such works or erections upon the banks of the river shall first be submitted to the Secretary of War for his approval: And provided further, That if said company shall elect to construct a pile and ponton bridge in lieu of that described above, the Secretary of War may, if he deem it advisable and not inconsistent with the free navigation of said river, authorize said company to construct said bridge as a pile or ponton bridge, subject to the restrictions and requirements relating to the construction thereof contained in the act entitled "An act to legalize and establish a ponton-bridge across the Mississippi River at Prairie du Chien," approved June 6, 1874, except that in the bridge herein authorized one draw only shall be required, which shall not be less than four hundred feet in width in the clear.

SEC. 3. That no bridge shall be erected or maintained under the authority of this act which shall at any time substantially or materially obstruct the free navigation of said river; and no bridge shall be commenced or built under this act until the location thereof and the plans and specifications for its construction shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War; and any change in the plan of such construction or any alteration in the bridge after its construction shall be subject to the like approval; and whenever said bridge shall, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, substantially obstruct the free navigation of said river, he is hereby authorized to cause such change or alteration of said bridge to be made as will effectually obviate such obstruction; and all such alterations shall be made and all such obstructions be removed at the expense of the owner or owners of said bridge; and in case of any litigation arising from any obstruction or alleged obstruction to the free navigation of the Missouri River at or near the crossing of said bridge, caused or alleged to be caused thereby, the cause shall be commenced and tried in the district courts of either judicial district of Iowa or Nebraska in which the said bridge or any portion of such obstruction touches.

SEC. 4. That any bridge built under this act, and according to its limitations, shall be a lawful structure, and shall be recognized and known as a post-route, upon which also no higher charge shall be made for the transportation over the same of the mails, the troops, and munitions of war of the United States than the rate per mile paid for their transportation over the railroads or public highways leading to such bridge. Such lights shall be kept upon said bridge as the Light-House Board shall direct, and said bridge shall moreover be provided with all proper safeguards for the security of person and property.

SEC. 5. That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The SPEAKER. It is very apparent from the reading of the bill that it is public and not private. Its provisions are broad, and operate upon many roads and corporations. The bill cannot be received therefore in the call of committees for reports of a private nature.

Mr. CONGER. From what committee is this bill reported?

The SPEAKER. From the Committee on Commerce. The Chair holds that it is not in order under this call.

HUGH W. MERCER.

Mr. ASHE. I am instructed by the Committee on the Judiciary, unanimously, to report favorably on the memorial of Hugh W. Mercer for relief, and to present a bill giving effect thereto.

The bill (H. R. No. 2953) for the relief of Hugh W. Mercer was received, and read a first and second time.

Mr. ASHE. I move that the bill and accompanying report be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

MRS. FLORA A. DARLING.

Mr. CABELL, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 401) for the relief of Mrs. Flora A. Darling, of New Hampshire; and the same was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

DANIEL F. DULANY.

Mr. HOSKINS, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 16) for the relief of Daniel F. Dulany, and moved that it do lie on the table, and that the accompanying report be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

HEIRS OF HALL NEILSON.

Mr. JOYCE, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back the petition of the heirs and representatives of the late Hall Neilson, of Richmond, Virginia, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION.

Mr. GUNTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report back the bill (H. R. No. 830) extending the time for filing suits in the Court of Claims to establish title to the Hot Springs reservation in Arkansas, and to move that the same be laid upon the table.

The SPEAKER. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. GUNTER. There is no written report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair begs leave to suggest that a written report should accompany every adverse recommendation.

The bill was laid on the table.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL GODFREY WEITZEL.

Mr. BANNING, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a joint resolution (H. R. No. 94) authorizing Lieutenant-Colonel Godfrey Weitzel, of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, to accept the position of trustee of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution authorizes Godfrey Weitzel, lieutenant-colonel Corps of Engineers, United States Army, to accept the position of trustee of the Cincinnati Southern Railroad, and provides that the acceptance of the same shall not be construed to interfere with his rank as an officer of the Army of the United States or to vacate his commission in the same.

Mr. BANNING. The present Secretary of War was the trustee of the Cincinnati and Southern Railroad. After he received his appointment as Secretary of War, Colonel Godfrey Weitzel was elected to that place. He cannot accept it without the passage of this resolution. The Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce have petitioned Congress to pass a resolution authorizing him to accept the position. Their resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee asked the opinion of the Secretary of War, and he asked the opinion of the General of the Army. The General of the Army replies, and recommends legislation authorizing General Weitzel to accept. The Secretary of War recommends it, the committee ask it, and I hope the resolution will be passed.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs a question. Is this place which it is provided that Colonel Weitzel may accept a place of emolument?

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. A salaried office?

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that there are objections to allowing the officers of the regular Army to accept trusteeships or directorships of railway companies, banking companies, or other business corporations, upon the same theory that objection was made a few minutes ago to the granting of a patent to a worthy officer, namely, that the Government is entitled to his entire time and service. The proposition is a new one to me. I do not remember during the time I have been here that any officer of the regular Army has been allowed to accept any office of emolument and trust so as to receive pay outside the Army. It strikes me that this is a departure from the practice heretofore followed, which may be somewhat dangerous as a precedent.

Mr. BANNING. I have to say in answer to the gentleman from Maine that I should be very glad if this officer could be allowed to receive the pay he is receiving now; but the Military Committee thought that he should not be paid by the Government, but by the city of Cincinnati. This is a railroad running from Cincinnati to Chattanooga. It is a railroad built by the city of Cincinnati alone. She has already expended $10,000,000 on it, and has just appropriated $6,000,000 more. It is a great improvement. General Weitzel is an able engineer. He is a citizen of Cincinnati. He managed the improvement at the falls of the Ohio. This is a work he is well capable of performing, and the resolution has the approval of the General of the Army.

I think there can be no objection to its passage. He declines to take the place unless he is authorized to do so by Congress. It has been customary for officers to take these places without any such authority. I believe one or two officers are now serving abroad in a civil capacity without any authority of Congress and contrary to law. This officer declines to accept the place, and in consequence of that declination this joint resolution is offered. I hope there will be no objection to its passage.

Mr. HALE. The merits of General Weitzel are well known to me, as he has served in my own State, as one of the best officers in the engineer service. The gentleman from Ohio has furnished to my mind an additional reason why we should not authorize him to accept this trusteeship in the pay of this company in the statement that he has been connected with this road as an employé of the Government, as an officer of the Engineer Corps upon work in connection with the road. That, to my mind, is an additional reason why he should not now become the company's trustee.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman from Maine be willing to vote for this joint resolution if it provides that he shall receive the pay which he now receives from the Government and nothing from the city of Cincinnati or the railroad company?

Mr. HALE. That would remove part of my objection, certainly.

Mr. BANNING. I will be very glad to modify the joint resolution in that way, and I think the Government might well give to the city of Cincinnati the benefit of the services of this officer.

Mr. HALE. I know that this road is a good one and that it will be a great improvement, but my cardinal objection is to Government officers taking these places in connection with private interests and private corporations. I think it is a bad precedent. We have already had more or less trouble and some bad scandal and some mortifying results from public officials in high places dabbling in speculative enterprises, and let us keep as far as we may all officers of the Government, and especially let us keep the Army, which has always maintained its reputation for being clear of all scandals and all speculations, comparatively if not entirely free from these scandals. It has been the pride of the Army officers that they rest upon their salaries, small as they are. The gentleman from Ohio himself is seeking to cut down the salaries of the officers of the Army. He passed a bill through the House the other day cutting down the salaries of the higher officers of the Army. Now I think that we had better not allow any officer of the Army to accept the directorship or trusteeship in outside corporations. That is not a good thing to do.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] if he does not know that there are instances now in Washington where officers of the Army are placed in civil positions and are receiving pay not only as Army officers, for their official positions in the Army, but also for the civil positions to which they are appointed?

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman mean appointed to positions under the Government, or by parties and corporations outside of the Government?

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I mean under the Government, and especially by the Chief Executive of the Government.

Mr. HALE. I do not know to what the gentleman alludes. Such a case would not be parallel to this, but I would go so far as to make the line of demarkation clear, and hold each officer of the Army to the duties pertaining to his branch of the service.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I understand it to be the law that if an officer of the Army is appointed to a civil position he thereby forfeits his position in the Army if he accepts that civil position. Now I wish to know of the gentleman—and it is a piece of information that I have thought of endeavoring to obtain from the head of the Department—if he does not know of several instances in the Executive Departments of the Government where an officer of the Army has accepted a civil position and is receiving pay both as an officer in the Army and as a civil officer?

Mr. HALE. What bush is the gentleman beating about? He might as well speak plainly.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I will speak plainly. Does the gentleman not know that General Babcock, an officer of the Army, was appointed by the President to a civil position, in other words to the position of his Secretary, and that under the law he forfeited his position in the Army, providing there was no law of Congress allowing him to accept a civil position?

Mr. HALE. I do not know any law by which General Babcock forfeited his position as an officer in the Corps of Engineers. I do know that the designation or detail of him to special duty, which was clerical and civilian in its nature, did not add a dollar to his pay; that he only received his regular pay as an officer in the Corps of Engineers, and that by his so doing pay to some one else was saved which had always been appropriated heretofore. There are some objections, I admit, to such an appointment, but I will not discuss those objections now. But that case, let me say, is nothing like the case now before the House. This is a case of an officer of engineers being authorized to accept a position of trust and emolument in connection with a railroad corporation as a trustee and still continue to hold his office in the Corps of Engineers, subject to the Government and to Government officers, and held by all the stern obligations that rest upon the officer of the Government who serves in any branch of the Army; the two cases are not alike.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. It seems to me that the law upon the statute-book is equally violated, whether the officer of the Army receives an appointment in the service of a corporation or whether he is appointed by the Executive or any other officer of the Government to a civil office. I think it is the same thing in either case, and not wise.

Mr. HALE. I do not believe that the higher officers in the Army would approve of any measure of this kind, allowing their subordinates by law to accept civil positions.

Mr. BANNING. In order to show the gentleman that he is mistaken, I ask the Clerk to read a letter of General Sherman upon this subject, and I ask the gentleman to listen to it.

Mr. HALE. Certainly I will; but it will not change my mind, even if he recommends it.

Mr. BANNING. Of course, when your arguments are knocked from under you, it does not change your mind.

Mr. HALE. It is not much of an argument anyway; more of an opinion.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 28, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of the letter of Hon. H. B. BANNING, House of Representatives, about the detail of General Weitzel as one of the commissioners of the railroad building from Cincinnati to Chattanooga. I hope the detail will be made, as General Weitzel is eminently qualified, and it is to the interest of the Army that the talents and industry of our engineer officers should be appreciated. Both the community and the service will be benefited. I hope Congress will modify the existing statute, which virtually prohibits the officers of the Army, both active and retired, from being employed on civil works; and this case of General Weitzel illustrates the danger of an actual, positive prohibition.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

W. T. SHERMAN,
General.

Hon. ALPHONSO TAFT,
Secretary of War.

Mr. HALE. I am bound to say that so far as General Sherman is concerned my assumption of belief is not well founded. But even with that letter, which I will say answers my objection so far as the general argument goes, none of the objections are removed which arose in my mind to the passage of this joint resolution. In fact, the more I think of it—and I believe that other members will find the same operation going on in their own minds—the more objection there seems to be to permitting a regular officer of the Army to be mixed up with any of these outside places.

Mr. CONGER. If the passage of this joint resolution will result in the removal of General Weitzel from the charge he now has of the public improvements on our lakes, the Sault Sainte Marie Canal, the harbor of refuge, and the improvements upon Lake Superior and Lake Michigan, I should oppose its passage. General Weitzel is one of the most accomplished engineers in the corps; he has done himself and the country great credit by his services in the construction of the canal at Louisville. He is now engaged in a similar work, the enlargement of the canal between Lake Huron and Lake Superior, and also has charge of other large works of that kind. If I understand correctly, he now asks the privilege of accepting a place which is rather honorary than one requiring his time or labor to any great extent. It is offered to him by the city of his residence, Cincinnati, which desires that he shall take the position of trustee or commissioner of a railroad in which the city is greatly interested, which position will occupy but a small portion of his time.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman is mistaken. The railroad wants his services because he is a capable engineer, and he will no doubt give his entire time to it if allowed to accept the position. I want the House to understand the case perfectly.

Mr. CONGER. While I would be pleased to gratify General Weitzel, I should be very sorry for the Engineer Corps to lose his services on the lakes.

Mr. HALE. If that is the case, why did not General Weitzel resign? Was it because by so doing he would lose a better office in the service?

Mr. BANNING. Why does not the gentleman resign when he is given a better place?

Mr. HALE. When I accept it I will; that will be reason enough.

Mr. BANNING. I do not wish to say anything further upon this except that by the passage of this joint resolution the Government would save the salary that is now paid to General Weitzel as an officer of the Engineer Corps and this great railroad corporation would obtain the aid of an able engineer. I hope the recommendations of General Sherman and of the Secretary of War will be sufficient to pass this joint resolution. I call the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I move to lay the joint resolution upon the table.

The question was taken upon laying the joint resolution on the table; and upon a division there were—ayes 48, noes 39.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. BANNING. I call for the yeas and nays on this motion.

Mr. HALE. Well, let us have the yeas and nays; it is an important matter enough for them.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman object to recommitting this joint resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. HALE. I will not object to that. I have no wish to take up the time of the House.

Mr. BANNING. I will then withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, and move that this joint resolution be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HALE. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. Certainly not; but to be reported again upon the regular call of the committee.

The joint resolution was accordingly recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back, with amendments, a bill (H. R. No. 357) to establish the Territory of Pembina and to provide a temporal government therefor, and moved that the bill, with the amendments, be printed and recommitted to the Committee on the Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Then I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the silver-coin bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. This is private-bill day, and by the rules of the House I insist that the consideration of private bills takes precedence over the unfinished business. I therefore move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The pending bill, referred to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] not being a special order in Committee of the Whole, the Chair would hold that, this being Friday, a motion that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar takes precedence over the motion to proceed to the consideration of the pending bill, the unfinished business of yesterday. But it is proper for the question of consideration to be raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] representing the Committee on Appropriations. The first question will be upon the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. If that fails, the question will be upon proceeding to the consideration of the bill pending as unfinished business.

Mr. RANDALL. The previous question has been ordered on the pending bill in regard to the silver coinage. It will take but an hour to dispose of the bill and amendment. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] in his remarks the other day depicted the great suffering which was taking place by reason of the delay in the passage of this bill. I now ask him to yield for an hour, so that we may to-day dispose finally of the bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. Just one word in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I am between Scylla and Charybdis. Here is the Private Calendar, which contains many bills appealing to our sympathies in the same manner as does the bill which is unfinished business. I prefer that the question should be submitted to the House.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was not agreed to; there being—ayes 45, noes not counted.

The question being then taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House resume the consideration of the unfinished business, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair can have the indulgence of the House for a few moments, he will dispose of a few matters on the Speaker's table.

There was no objection.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (S. No. 644) to authorize the printing and distribution of the eulogies delivered in Congress on the announcement of the death of the late Orris S. Ferry, a Senator from the State of Connecticut.

DISBURSEMENTS BY WAR DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a statement of the disbursements made from the appropriation of March 3, 1875; which was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department.

ROCK ISLAND BRIDGE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting papers relating to the claim of the Baltimore Bridge Company for extra compensation for the construction of the Rock Island bridge; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

LAUNDRESSES IN THE ARMY.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from Captain W. G. Wedemeyer, in reference to the employment of laundresses in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMISSARY STORES AT FRONTIER POSTS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, a statement showing the cost of certain commissary stores at various frontier posts for the past two years; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

COMMUNICATION BETWEEN COLORADO AND NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of the House of the 15th instant, a copy of the report of Lieutenant Ruffner, relative to the lines of communication between Southern Colorado and Northern New Mexico; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. WALKER, of New York, indefinitely on account of sickness; to Mr. SOUTHARD for one week from yesterday on account of important business; to Mr. BEEBE till Wednesday next on account of sickness; to Mr. THOMAS for two days on account of business; to Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey, for one week from to-morrow; to Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania, for four days on account of important business; to Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, indefinitely on account of business; to Mr. NORTON for ten days on account of important business; to Mr. NEW till Thursday next on account of business; to Mr. HAYMOND for one week, and to Mr. DOUGLAS for ten days from to-morrow.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. Is it the pleasure of the House to take up at this time for appropriate reference the bills on the Speaker's table?

There was no objection.

MORAN'S PAINTINGS AT THE CENTENNIAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. No. 11) to authorize the Joint Committee on the Library to permit Thomas Moran to exhibit two paintings at the centennial exhibition in Philadelphia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WADDELL. Is it in order to move by unanimous consent to put that joint resolution on its passage at this time?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. WADDELL. Then I ask unanimous consent to put the joint resolution on its passage at this time, and to submit a brief statement.

There was no objection.

The joint resolution, which was read, authorizes the Joint Committee on the Library to permit Thomas Moran to exhibit at the international exposition at Philadelphia the two paintings executed by himself entitled "The Cañons of the Yellowstone" and the "Chasms of the Colorado;" provided the said Moran shall cause the same to be insured to the satisfaction of the chairman of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress for the benefit of the United States against loss by accident or otherwise and shall return the same to their places in the Capitol on or before the 1st day of December next.

Mr. WADDELL. I made an effort a few days ago to get unanimous consent at a late hour of the session to pass this joint resolution and to explain the reason for it. It authorizes Mr. Thomas Moran to take two paintings which hang in the Senate wing of the Capitol, the one called the "Grand Cañon of the Yellowstone" and the other "The Chasms of the Colorado," to the centennial exhibition at Philadelphia. It was referred to the Senate branch of the Library Committee, considered there, unanimously reported to that body, and unanimously passed. The condition upon which he is allowed to take the paintings is that he shall bear all expenses, including insurance of the paintings.

Mr. COX. I doubt the propriety of allowing these paintings to go from under this roof, and I will give you my reason. This is the centennial year. That has been observed in this House. [Laughter.] There will be a large throng of people from all parts of the country and from all parts of the world at this capital. I do not believe it is possible for anybody to insure these pictures. You cannot insure pictures to any special amount.

Mr. WADDELL. He said he would reproduce them if they were injured.

Mr. COX. It is a bad precedent to set to send our pictures away to Philadelphia or anywhere else. We might as well send our statuary to Philadelphia; we might as well agree to have the Dome carried off to Philadelphia. [Laughter.] I move that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. GARFIELD. We ought not to pick out one set of pictures in this way.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Library.

CUSTOM-HOUSE BONDS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a bill (H. R. No. 2135) relating to the execution of custom-house bonds, returned from the Senate with an amendment; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

FOURTEENTH OF APRIL DECLARED A HOLIDAY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday; which was read a first and second time, and suggested it be referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KASSON. It relates, Mr. Speaker, to another subject entirely, and I hope, instead of being referred, the House will agree to put it on its passage at this time. There is to be a local celebration here in this city, connected with the inauguration of a monument by the colored people in commemoration of Abraham Lincoln. It is to take place here in this city.

Mr. RANDALL. And for that day alone.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is a special case, and I hope the House will agree to the resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Let the resolution be reported.

The preamble recites that on the 14th day of April next a statue, secured by the contributions of the freedmen of the country, to the memory of Abraham Lincoln, late President of the United States, will be unveiled with appropriate ceremonies in Lincoln Park, Washington City, District of Columbia; and that all persons desiring to do so should be given the opportunity of attending such exercises, thus by their presence honoring the memory of our martyred President. The resolution therefore provides that all persons employed in the various Departments of the Government situated in the District of Columbia be granted a general holiday on the 14th day of April, 1876.

Mr. KASSON. I hope that will be agreed to.

Mr. COCHRANE. I hope there will be no objection to the resolution. I shall vote for it with great pleasure.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

DEPOSIT OF FUNDS IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (S. No. 614) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to deposit certain funds in the United States Treasury in lieu of investment; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, returned from the Senate with sundry amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and that the amendments be numbered and ordered to be printed together with the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

TESTIMONY OF ACCOMPLICES IN CRIMINAL CASES.

Mr. LORD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report in reference to a letter from the Attorney-General of the United States to the district attorneys of Chicago, Milwaukee, and Saint Louis, relating to his instructions as to the testimony of accomplices in criminal cases; which was ordered to be printed and recommitted.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House now proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill in reference to the Printing and Engraving Bureau and the issue of subsidiary silver coin.

The motion was agreed to; and the House (Mr. COX in the chair as Speaker pro tempore) resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been ordered on the bill and amendments. The pending question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] as amended on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. WELLS.] The Clerk will read the amendment as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add the following as section 3:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby prohibited from making any further increase in the interest-bearing debt of the United States by the issue and sale of bonds for the purchase of silver bullion for coinage; but silver bullion shall, under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, be received by the several mints for fabrication into subsidiary coins, and paid for in such coins at a rate or price per ounce to be fixed from time to time, according to the market rate, by the Director of the Mint, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the basis of the difference between the par value of such coin and the value of such bullion; and an addition not exceeding 1 per cent., in the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be made to the purchasing price as an allowance for the transportation of the coin; and the excess of the par value of such coin over the value of the bullion so deposited, less the amount that shall be allowed for transportation as aforesaid, determined as above provided, shall be from time to time covered into the Treasury as the Secretary of the Treasury shall direct: Provided, however, That such silver coins of the denominations aforesaid and the silver bullion now owned by the United States shall not exceed in par value the par value of the fractional currency now authorized by law: Provided, That if silver bullion is not presented for coinage in sufficient quantity for the redemption of fractional currency, the Secretary of the Treasury may, under the provisions of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, purchase silver bullion for the purposes of coinage as provided in said act.

The question being taken on the amendment, as amended, there were—ayes 48, noes 82.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask for tellers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair under the rule will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask that the amendment may be again read.

The amendment was again read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 77.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the yeas and nays. I do so for the purpose of obliging my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] who is detained from the House by sickness, and desires that there shall be a record of the vote on his amendment.

On the question of ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 21, noes 117.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 682) to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, and for other purposes; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to the Bureau of Printing and Engraving and the issue of subsidiary silver coin.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a parliamentary question. Is it in order now to move to recommit the bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not at this stage. The previous question has not exhausted itself.

Mr. O'BRIEN. After the engrossment and third reading, when the previous question will have exhausted itself, will a motion to recommit then be in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not decide such questions in advance. He can only decide the parliamentary points in regard to the present stage of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 100, noes 82.

So the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I desire to know of the Chair what it is that the House is now voting on?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the bill as amended.

Mr. RANDALL. The bill is now as it was reported by the Committee on Appropriations, with an amendment added to it on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. That amendment alone?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state for the information of members that the bill as amended by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is now before the House, and the question is on seconding the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOSKINS. I ask that the amendment adopted in Committee of the Whole on the motion of the gentleman from Texas be read.

Mr. TUCKER. I move to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order. The Clerk will read the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, which was adopted by the House.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Before the reading of the amendment I desire to ask a parliamentary question: Whether if the call for the previous question is defeated I will not have the privilege then of moving to recommit the bill with instructions?

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the Chair to decide now.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I give notice that if the previous question is defeated I will make that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That statement is not in order.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Rule 124 says that at any time before the passage of a bill it may be recommitted. I wish to know how we are ever to get at the motion to recommit if it is not in order now? The previous question was exhausted when the Clerk read the bill the third time by its title.

Mr. RANDALL. But I was recognized by the Chair to move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The previous question is not now in operation. It has been asked for, but has not been voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will say that no gentleman holds the floor but the gentleman from Pennsylvania. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] must be aware that by the rules the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has charge of the bill, can move the previous question on the passage of the bill. That takes precedence of a motion to recommit.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The inquiry to which I rose was this: Does the asking of the previous question by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, when the previous question has been exhausted on the engrossment and third reading of the bill and has not been renewed, preclude the motion to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] was recognized and made the motion to renew the operation of the previous question. That is the motion now pending. The Clerk will now read, as requested by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HOSKINS,] the amendment to this bill, which has been adopted by the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 4 the following:

That the silver coins of the United States of the denomination of $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $50 in any one payment. And silver coins of the United States of denominations of less than $1 shall be a legal tender at their nominal value for any amount not exceeding $25 in any one payment.

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Indiana having been defeated, this amendment will be section 3 of the bill. I ask that that change may be made in the numbering of the section.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That change will be made by the Clerk.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the House should not second the demand for the previous question would a motion then to recommit be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not propose to decide those matters until the House reaches them.

The question being taken on seconding the demand for the previous question, there were—ayes 108, noes 79.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken on the motion of Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDEN, Mr. BAKER, of Indiana, and others called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 123, nays 100, not voting 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., William H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Bell, Blair, Blount, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Caulfield, Chapin, Chittenden, Clymer, Cochrane, Conger, Crounse, Culberson, Cutler, Danford, Denison, Douglas, Durand, Eames, Farwell, Fort, Foster, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Gibson, Goode, Gunter, Hale, Hancock, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Harrison, Hathorn, Hendee, Henderson, Goldsmith W. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Turney, Waldron, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walls, Erastus Wells, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, White, Whiting, Wigginton, Wike, Willard, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, William B. Williams, Wilshire, James Wilson, Alan Wood, jr. Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Yeates—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Baker, Banning, Beebe, Blackburn, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Cate, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Cook, Crapo, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Dunnell, Durham, Eden, Egbert, Evans, Felton, Forney, Franklin, Fuller, Glover, Goodin, Andrew H. Hamilton, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Hartzell, Hatcher, Haymond, Hereford, Abram S. Hewitt, Hopkins, House, Hunter, Hunton, Thomas L. Jones, Franklin Landers, Lord, McFarland, McMahon, Milliken, Money, Morgan, Neal, New, Oliver, Packer, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Poppleton, Rea, John Reilly, James B. Reilly, Rice, Riddle, William M. Robbins, Robinson, Savage, Sayler, Scales, Seelye, Sheakley, Slemons, Sparks, Springer, Stevenson, Stone, Tarbox, Thompson, Tucker, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Robert B. Vance, Waddell, Gilbert C. Walker, Walling, Walsh, Ward, Warren, Whitehouse, James D. Williams, Jeremiah N. Williams, Willis, Woodworth, and Young—100.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ainsworth, Barnum, Bass, Blaine, Bland, Bliss, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Caswell, Collins, Cowan, Cox, Darrall, Davy, Dobbins, Ellis, Ely, Faulkner, Freeman, Gause, Robert Hamilton, Hartridge, Hays, Henkle, Hill, Hoar, Holman, Hooker, Hurd, Hurlbut, Frank Jones, Kelley, Ketchum, King, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lane, Lawrence, Lewis, Edmund W. M. Mackey, L. A. Mackey, Maish, McDill, Metcalfe, Mills, Nash, Parsons, Payne, Purman, Rainey, Roberts, Sobieski Ross, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Stenger, Stowell, Swann, Thomas, Charles C. B. Walker, Whitthorne, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, and Benjamin Wilson—66.

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call,

Mr. TEESE said: I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, is absent by leave on business of the House; if here, he would vote "ay."

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. STENGER, is absent on important business; if here, he would vote "ay." I desire also to announce that my colleague, Mr. MAISH, is also absent on business.

Mr. HOSKINS. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. DAVY, is absent by leave of the House; if present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. My colleague, Mr. MACKEY, is still confined to his room by sickness.

Mr. HOPKINS. My colleague, Mr. MACKEY, is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I call for the previous question on the title of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the title of the bill was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar; but before doing so I will yield for a few moments to gentlemen who have matters they desire to bring before the House, with the understanding that they will not lead to debate.

BUSINESS OF DISTILLING.

Mr. WHITING, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2954) concerning corporations engaged in the business of distilling; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF THE OLD WASHINGTON JAIL.

Mr. HENDEE. I ask unanimous consent that the bill of the Senate (S. No. 682) to suspend the sale of the jail in Judiciary Square and for other purposes be taken up for consideration.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up and read.

It directs the Chief Engineer of the Army to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square in the city of Washington, and that the same be turned over for the use of the authorities of the District of Columbia temporarily, or until other jail facilities are provided; and it shall be lawful for the courts of the District of Columbia to order the confinement of prisoners therein.

Mr. HENDEE. If I can have the attention of the House for a moment I will attempt to show the importance of the passage of this bill at this time. In one of the appropriation bills of the last Congress it was provided that the old jail-building upon Judiciary Square should be sold, and that the funds arising from that sale should be appropriated to beautifying and improving the square itself. It is well know that within the last three or four years the United States has built a new jail in the northeastern part of the city for the confinement of criminals. When that jail was built it was supposed that it would be sufficient for the confinement of all the criminals sentenced by all the courts of this District, as well as the United States courts. But it has turned out to be too small for that purpose. There are two hundred and seventy-two single cells in that jail, and at this time there are two hundred and eighty-nine prisoners confined there.

It is also a fact that at the present time the criminals of this District who are sentenced by the police court are confined in the Washington Asylum building together with the poor supported by the District. In fact the poor of this District and the criminals of this District are kept in the same building. I look upon this as a great injustice to the poor, and I consider that the criminals are enjoying better company than they are entitled to.

Unless this old jail-building can be kept and used for a while it will be absolutely necessary, in order to take care of the criminals of this District, to build a new jail, which we should avoid if possible. General Babcock, under the law, has advertised the sale of this old jail-building to take place next Tuesday.

There is already before the Committee for the District of Columbia a bill providing that the old jail building shall be used for the purpose of constructing a wall about the new jail. That bill should be considered before the old building is sold; and in any event I think the commissioners of the District should have the power to confine criminals in the old jail rather than to continue to keep them in the company of the poor of the District. I hope this bill will pass.

Mr. GARFIELD. I would inquire of the gentleman what is the purpose of the Committee for the District of Columbia in regard to the ultimate disposition of the old jail?

Mr. HENDEE. We have no purpose at the present time in regard to it.

Mr. GARFIELD. Are both the old and new buildings to be used as jails?

Mr. HENDEE. The proposition simply is to turn over the old building temporarily to the commissioners of the District until some place can be provided in which to put the prisoners sentenced to confinement in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the new jail in full operation now?

Mr. HENDEE. It is. It has two hundred and seventy-two single cells, and at the present time there are two hundred and eighty-nine prisoners confined there. The gentleman is aware, I suppose, that crime is increasing very fast in this District.

Mr. GARFIELD. Is the new jail full?

Mr. HENDEE. It is more than full; and the Attorney-General has refused to receive in it any criminals sentenced by the police courts of this District.

Mr. GARFIELD. I still want further information. The great object we had in view in appropriating money a few years ago to build the new jail was to provide ample accommodation for the criminals of this District, and also to clear away the unsightly building on Judiciary Square, a square that should be one of the most beautiful in this city. If that eyesore is to be made permanent, without any arrangement for its ultimate demolition, I should regard it as a very serious matter. For one, I would rather there should be a little discomfort somewhere than to continue that building.

Mr. HENDEE. We shall have to turn our criminals into the streets.

Mr. GARFIELD. How many are in the old jail now?

Mr. HENDEE. None; but the Washington Asylum, which is the poor-house and work-house of the District, has in it to-day two hundred and fifteen criminals and two hundred and nineteen paupers of this District confined together. We propose to take the criminals out of that building and put them in the old jail, where they belong. This bill makes only temporary provision until some arrangements can be made.

Mr. GARFIELD. Then I insist that we should have some limitation upon this matter of the old jail. The necessities of this hard winter, which no doubt have driven a great many men to the commission of crime, are only special, and I have no doubt they will pass away by spring.

The fact was communicated a few days ago to a committee of which I am a member that there are now in the city of Philadelphia over eleven hundred people wearing the badge of criminals, people who are self-committed, who want to the jails, not because they had committed crime, but because they were out of work and had nothing to live upon, and absolutely consented to the disgrace of becoming criminals in the poor-houses and jails of that city for the sake of avoiding the hardships of the winter. I hope, and I am inclined to believe, that a large number of the prisoners in our very large jail here is in a measure due to the hard winter.

I therefore suggest that this postponement of the sale of this old jail shall not be for more than four months, and that at the end of that time the sale shall go on. I will move an amendment to that effect.

Mr. HENDEE. I do not yield for an amendment. I wish to say that this bill was introduced into the Senate this morning by Senator MORRILL, of Vermont, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and as I understand was passed unanimously by the Senate in order to stop the sale of this building. I ask that this House shall concur in the passage of the bill, in order that it may receive the signature of the President in time to prevent this sale taking place on next Tuesday. If the sale is not stopped, then the question arises, will we not be called upon to furnish some place for the confinement of these criminals at a great expense to the District and to the country? It seems to me that this old building while standing there might as a matter of economy, if nothing else, be used for this purpose.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will accept the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.] We have spent for the benefit of this District, in building a new and large jail, half a million dollars. Now I do not think the gentleman himself wants to do anything that will put upon us as a perpetuity the maintenance of two jails. Will not the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] which proposes to fix a limit to this suspension, meet that objection? Will not the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] yield to allow the amendment to be voted upon?

Mr. HENDEE. Certainly, if the gentleman wishes a vote upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move, then, to add to the bill this clause:

Provided, That the suspension of the sale and removal of the old jail shall not extend further than July 1, 1876.

Mr. HENDEE. In order to accommodate my friend from Ohio, I yield to have the amendment voted upon; but I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it is very easy indeed to put into a law some make-shift intended to have a merely temporary effect, but which, if not limited as to the time of its operation, becomes a permanent law. I might give a dozen instances of that sort of management. In 1866 we started upon a career toward specie payments on a plan which, if it had been persisted in, would certainly have wrought out that end, so that long ago we should have been out of our trouble on that subject. But after that policy had been initiated some people said it was pinching a little, that its operation was somewhat severe, and therefore, in order for the time being to let up over a hard place, they proposed that the law should be suspended until the further action of Congress. The suspension was understood to be for just a few months, "until the crops should be moved," or until something else should be done; and there was a sort of moral promise that as soon as this was done the original act should again become operative. With that understanding the suspension was rushed through Congress with very little consideration or debate. But it has continued in force for ten years, and is the law to-day. There we have an illustration of the effect of the miserable make-shift policy of repealing for a temporary object, but without limitation as to time, a wise law, or one which, if not entirely wise, would have accomplished the desired result.

In the present case we have provided by law for the building of a new jail, which is now completed. One of the great purposes in providing for the erection of that building was to get rid of that old, unsightly, wretched, cholera hospital, a place hardly fit to put a human being in; to sweep away that nuisance from Judiciary Square. Provision has been made by law for the demolition of that old structure; but now, as a matter of temporary pressure, we are asked to suspend the order for its removal. Suspend that order in the form proposed in this bill, and that unsightly structure will remain indefinitely. It will require a series of legislative campaigns to get rid of that old jail. On the other hand, the insertion of a single clause limiting the operation of this bill until the 1st of July next will settle the matter.

It is so easy to fix things while you are at them; it is so difficult to adjust them if you let the favorable moment pass. We have now a law providing that the old jail must go down. My friend from Vermont shows sufficient reason why it should be allowed to stand for a few months; but he shows no reason why it should be continued as a perpetual nuisance upon our public grounds.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this amendment will not prevail, because I am perfectly satisfied, from the information I have, that if it be adopted we shall have to pass between now and the 1st of July next another act providing a still further suspension. It has become a fact that in this District the courts have to cut short the terms of confinement of criminals who are sent to the Washington Asylum and other places because there is no place in which they can be confined properly. It seems to me that this old jail being ample for the purposes here contemplated, and being now empty, the commissioners and the courts of this District should have the power to use it temporarily until some other means can be provided; that we should not, at this time of economy, permit the sale of that jail and expend the money, and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars more, for the purpose of beautifying that square. I hope the amendment will not prevail. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. GARFIELD was rejected, there being ayes 13, noes not counted.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. CATE, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed as part of the debates remarks on the bill (H. R. No. 2450) to provide for a deficiency in the Printing and Engraving Bureau of the Treasury Department and for the issue of silver coin of the United States in place of fractional currency. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. In connection with that I ask unanimous consent that to-day be considered "objection day." We lost our "objection day" last week.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion cannot be entertained. "Objection day" is fixed by the rules absolutely.

Mr. BRIGHT. I supposed that the rules could be suspended by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The rules cannot be suspended, except by a motion on Monday or on one of the last ten days of the session.

Mr. BRIGHT. Well, I insist on my motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Pending that motion, I move that the House now take a recess.

Mr. BRIGHT. I submit that that is not in order. By the rule which we have established, it was provided that the recess should be taken at half past four o'clock.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I hope the gentleman does not presume to intimate that we cannot take a recess whenever we please or adjourn whenever we please?

Mr. BRIGHT. I admit that, Mr. Speaker; but it was the understanding or agreement that we should work until half past four o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland did not have the floor to make the motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not yield for any motion.

Mr. BRIGHT's motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.)

MISSOURI LAND CLAIMS.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business on the Private Calendar is a bill (H. R. No. 819) to confirm certain land claims in the State of Missouri.

Mr. PHILIPS, of Missouri. That bill was reported from the Committee on Private Land Claims by my colleague, [Mr. BUCKNER,] who is absent by leave of the House on account of sickness, and I ask it be passed over for the present, not however to lose its place upon the Calendar.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

PRIVATE LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee of the Whole rose from the consideration of the Private Calendar on a previous Friday the unfinished business was a bill (H. R. No. 344) to confirm certain land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, upon which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HANCOCK] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JOYCE. That bill was reported by me from the Committee on Private Land Claims. I do not see the gentleman from Texas present, and if there be no objection I will consent to the bill being passed over for the present, provided it does not lose its place upon the Calendar.

The CHAIRMAN. It will retain its place upon the Calendar.

Mr. JOYCE. Then let it be passed over.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

MARY W. JONES.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones.

The bill, which was read, directs the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Mary W. Jones, the widow of the late Commodore Ap C. Jones, on the pension-roll for an increase of pension of $20 a month, to be paid from the passage of this act, making a pension of $50 a month.

The report was read, as follows:

The petitioner in this case is Mrs. Mary W. Jones, the widow of Thomas Ap C. Jones. The facts show that the husband of petitioner was, for about fifty-three years, an officer in the United States Navy. He received a wound while commanding the United States flotilla at the battle of New Orleans in the war with Great Britain. From this wound he never fully recovered. Thomas Ap C. Jones died in 1858. The son of petitioner, Lieutenant-Commander M. Patterson Jones, served twenty-five years in the United States Navy, serving with fidelity during the late war of the rebellion. He died suddenly in 1866, while on duty at the navy-yard Washington, District of Columbia. The loyalty of the petitioner is clearly shown by testimony filed with the petition.

Mrs. Jones received a pension from July 1, 1858, to January 1, 1870, at $50 per month, when it was cut down to $30 per month. The committee of the last Congress unanimously recommended the relief asked in the bill introduced for her relief at that time, and now re-introduced. The eminent services of the petitioner's husband and son, as herein set forth, would seem to warrant this committee in making a similar report.

The committee therefore recommend that the accompanying bill, giving petitioner $50 per month from passage thereof, do pass.

The bill was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

LANDS CEDED UNDER TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842.

The preamble recites that the United States, in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842, by adopting a conventional line "from the monument at the source of the river Saint Croix, running north, following the exploring-line run and marked by the surveyors of the two governments in the years 1817 and 1818," instead of a true north line, did cede to the British Crown a strip of land commencing at an angle at said monument and increasing to nearly one mile in width at the river Saint John, certain portions of which, amounting to 10,718 acres and 137 square rods, had been granted to citizens of the United States by the States of Maine and Massachusetts while the same were within the lines of the United States and for which the United States received compensation in equivalents and concessions from the British Crown; and that the United States have made compensation to the States of Maine and Massachusetts for so much of said territory as was owned by them, respectively, and all citizens owning lands on the west of said exploring-line which vested in British subjects by operation of the treaty aforesaid under the act of July 12, 1862, and other acts, and have hitherto failed to make compensation to those citizens owning lands upon the strip and tract east of said exploring-line, which passed either to British subjects or the British Crown by virtue of said exploring-line being adopted as the treaty-line between the two countries at that point, whereby said citizens became entitled to compensation for said lands so appropriated to public use.

The bill then authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the parties entitled thereto compensation for said land taken from the State of Maine by said conventional line, and included in the province of New Brunswick, not exceeding 10,718 acres and 137 square rods appropriated by the United States as aforesaid, its value in money at the date of said appropriation; provided that the whole amount of compensation so made shall not exceed an average compensation of $3 per acre, and that the same shall be distributed and applied in proportion to the relative value of said lands when appropriated; and provided further, that all payments made under the act shall be in full of all compensation due by the United States for the lands so appropriated; and provided further, that in determining the amount and value of the land appropriated and the amount of compensation to be made to any claimant the Secretary of the Treasury may use any evidence heretofore taken in relation thereto by the Department of State or by the States of Maine or Massachusetts, and any and all official documents and correspondence pertaining thereto.

The second section provides that to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to carry the foregoing section into effect $45,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is thereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The amendments of the Committee of Claims are as follows:

In section 1 insert after the word "appropriation" these words:

And also for all timber cut therefrom by British subjects during the suspension of jurisdiction by the respective governments preceding said treaty.

In section 2 strike out "forty" and insert "thirty;" so it will read, "$35,000," &c.

The amendments were agreed to.

The report of the Committee of Claims made by Mr. TARBOX is as follows:

They find that the recitals of the preamble to the bill are true.

The subject-matter was before the Forty-third Congress, upon the petition of James A. Drew and others, and the careful report made thereon by Mr. DUNNELL of the Committee of Claims, which accompanies H. R. 2873, of the first session of that Congress, sets forth fully and concisely the facts and conclusions that establish the validity of the claim of the beneficiaries under this bill for the indemnity it provides.

Under the treaty of 1783, the division-line between the United States and the province of New Brunswick, on the east, was agreed to be a line drawn due north from the source of the Saint Croix River to the highlands that divide the waters flowing into the Gulf of Saint Lawrence from those which flow into the Atlantic Ocean. A dispute arose afterward in regard to the location of these highlands, which was not adjusted until the convention of 1842, which composed this and other vexed controversies. In 1794 the two governments determined the spot to be regarded as the source of the Saint Croix and identified it by a monument. No formal survey of this due-north line was ever made by the two governments in concert; but by authority of the State of Massachusetts the line was run from the monument by surveyors, in 1804, and in 1840 by Major Graham, of the United States topographical engineers. That the line fixed by these explorations is the true treaty-line of 1783 was claimed as beyond question by our Government, and in effect conceded by Lord Ashburton in the negotiations that preceded the conclusion of the convention of 1842. Long prior to this latter convention, and before the territorial dispute arose, the State of Massachusetts made grants of lands, by townships, chiefly to educational institutions and soldiers distinguished for patriotic services, bounding easterly on this line. By the treaty of 1842 a new boundary was adopted, in place of the old, to meet commercial and political exigencies, for which the United States obtained valuable compensations in the settlement of other boundaries. As thus newly established, the boundary, commencing at the head of the Saint Croix, by the monument, was made to diverge some degrees westerly from due north. In consequence of this variation, and by operation of the treaty provisions, the title to an amount of land equal to ten thousand acres or more, lying between the two boundaries, was divested from the proprietors under the grants and vested in British subjects; and it is to indemnify the proprietors for these lands taken by the sovereign power for a public use that the committee recommend the passage of the accompanying bill of relief.

In the year 1833, in consequence of the disagreement as to the boundary, it was arranged between the two governments, as appears from the diplomatic correspondence, that both governments should suspend the exercise of jurisdiction over the disputed territory (which included these lands) until a final adjustment of the controversy. This diplomatic understanding was adhered to until the convention of 1842 composed the troubles, with the exception that the authorities of Maine, in 1839, interfered by force to protect the valuable timber forests from depredations. During the period of suspended jurisdiction, principally from 1832 to 1839, and while the owners were powerless to protect their rights and interests, these lands were settled upon and the valuable growth of timber thereon removed by the subjects of Great Britain from the contiguous province. Under the operation of the fourth article of the treaty of 1842 these "squatters" who had been in actual possession for six years before the date of the treaty were confirmed in their titles, to the exclusion of the proprietors whose title was derived under their grants. Judicial determinations fully establish this construction and give effect to it. (See Little vs. Watson, 32 Maine Reports, page 214.)

The obligation of the Government to make this indemnity seems too clear for discussion, and is confessed by abundant precedent. In recognition of this obligation the Federal Government, by express provision of the treaty, allowed to the States of Maine and Massachusetts $300,000 for their public lands within the territorial cession.

By the act of July 12, 1862, Congress admitted and satisfied claims made for lands of individual owners which fell within the jurisdiction of the United States upon the reconstruction of boundaries, but which the proprietors were dispossessed of under the fourth article of the treaty, and the title thereto vested in British subjects. The lands specified in this bill constituted a portion of the townships granted by Massachusetts, which, at the date of the grants, were indisputably a part of her public domain. By the establishment of the conventional line of 1842 a section of these townships remained, as before, within the Federal jurisdiction, and a section was transferred to the British Crown. As to the whole, the American owners were dispossessed. For the part which fell within the jurisdiction, the Federal Government, acknowledging its liability, has made compensation. For the part which passed to the foreign jurisdiction, the bill under consideration proposes indemnity. The right to compensation in the two cases seems identical. It is pertinent to recall that a pecuniary compensation was made to the States of Maine and Massachusetts for their public lands so transferred to the British government, and of the lands so paid for by the Federal Government, a part occupied the same relative position as those covered by the provisions of this bill. Surely the right of the private proprietor to compensation should not be held less than the right of the State.

Exhaustive reports upon the various claims of this class, arising out of the treaty of 1842 have been submitted by committees of both branches of Congress in former years, with concurrent unanimity sustaining their justice and validity. We refer particularly to reports—

In the Senate:

By Mr. Wade, third session Thirty-fourth Congress, (Report No. 323.)

By Mr. Clark, first session Thirty-fifth Congress, (Report No. 168.)

In the House:

By Mr. Maynard, first session Thirty-fifth Congress, (Report No. 394.)

By Mr. Walton, second session Thirty-seventh Congress, (Report No. 72.)

By Mr. DUNNELL, first session Forty-third Congress, (Report No. 386.)

The bill reported favorably from the Committee of Claims of the last House of Representatives passed the House, but failed to secure action in the Senate.

The States of Maine and Massachusetts have each taken action in aid of the claimants, urging the justice of the claim upon the attention of the Government. The governor and council of Maine, in 1869, in execution of a resolution of the Legislature, investigated the subject, and found that the territory in question embraced 107.8 acres 137 rods, and its average value $3 an acre. The act of July 12, 1862, allowed compensation for contiguous lands of no greater value, inclusive of damage for timber removals while the exercise of jurisdiction was suspended, at the rate of $4 per acre.

The committee recommend that the bill pass with certain amendments, to wit: First, after the word "appropriation," in the tenth line in the first section of the printed bill, insert the words "and also for all timber cut therefrom by British subjects during the suspension of jurisdiction by the respective governments preceding said treaty." Second, in the twelfth line of the first section strike out the word "four" and insert "three," and strike out the words "more than." Third, in the second line of the second section strike out the word "forty" and insert "thirty" instead.

The bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS, VERMONT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was a bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the First National Bank of Saint Albans, at Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin, and State of Vermont, late financial agent and designated depository of public moneys of the United States, (under section 45 of the national-currency act, approved June 3, 1864,) the sum of $28,650, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, being the amount of United States 7.30 Treasury notes held by said bank as such financial agent of the United States for delivery to subscribers therefor, and belonging to the United States, and having been forcibly seized and taken away by an armed band of raiders from Canada, acting under the military authority and direction of the so-called Confederate States of America, on the 19th day of October, 1864, without the fault or neglect of the officers of said bank.

Mr. EDEN'S report was read, as follows:

The facts relative to the claim are stated in the report of the Senate Committee on Claims made to the Forty-third Congress, as follows:

On October 19, 1864, occurred what is known as the Saint Albans raid. About three o'clock in the afternoon of that day parties of from three to five men each, armed with navy revolvers, concealed under their coats, entered the three banks in the village of Saint Albans, Vermont. In two of the banks the cashiers and tellers were present; in the third, the cashier was alone. The men stated that they were confederate soldiers; that they had come to rob the banks and fire the village; and, presenting their pistols, threatened the officers of the banks with instant death if they should make any resistance or give any alarm. They then proceeded to rob the banks. Meantime other parties were seizing horses through the town, and, meeting with some resistance from the citizens, they began to fire on men passing in the streets, killing one or two and wounding others; and they also attempted to fire a hotel and some other buildings by the use of Greek fire. The banks were soon plundered, horses enough to mount the raiders seized, saddled, and bridled, and within thirty minutes after the banks were entered the whole party was galloping toward Canada. The citizens of Saint Albans, as soon as they recovered from the surprise of such an unexpected attack, armed and dispatched a company in pursuit of the raiders, and, by their active efforts that night and the next morning, ten of the raiders were taken and $74,000 of the stolen money recovered. Proceedings were begun in the Canadian courts for the extradition of the raiders thus taken, but the courts decided that their deeds were the acts of belligerents and not robbery and murder; that therefore they could not deliver them under the extradition treaty, and they were accordingly discharged.

June 22, 1864, the First National Bank of Saint Albans had been designated a depository and financial agent of the United States, and had been authorized to receive subscriptions for bonds and Treasury notes of the United States. They did receive, in September and the early part of October, subscriptions to the amount of $35,000 for the three-years' coupon Treasury notes bearing 7.3 per cent. interest, issued under the act of June 30, 1864. The money on these subscriptions was paid into the bank and placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States; report thereof was made to him, the Treasury notes were ordered for the subscribers, and, October 15, 1864, were received to the amount of $35,000. The bank immediately notified the subscribers, and by the 19th they had delivered $6,350 of them to subscribers residing in the vicinity. The remaining notes, $28,650, being the subscriptions of thirty persons, were seized and carried off by the raiders, together with large amounts of money and other property in the safes of the banks. The thirty subscribers demanded the delivery of the notes or the return of the money paid by them; and the bank, recognizing the demand as both morally and legally valid, paid to the subscribers their respective amounts, and now seeks relief from the Government for the same.

Section 5153 of the Revised Statutes provides that "all national-banking associations, designated for that purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall be depositories of public money, except receipts from customs, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary, and they may also be employed as financial agents of the Government, and they shall perform all such reasonable duties as depositories of public moneys and financial agents of the Government as may be required of them.

Under the authority of said section, the Treasurer of the United States, on the 22d day of June, 1864, designated the First National Bank of Saint Albans a depository of public moneys, and on the 25th day of July, 1864, the Secretary of the Treasury authorized said bank "to receive deposits for three years' coupon Treasury notes, bearing interest at the rate of 7.3 per cent. per annum, to be issued under the act approved June 30, 1864," these notes to bear date August 15, 1864, payable three years after date, in lawful money, to be issued in blank or payable to order, as depositors should elect. The instructions of the Secretary of the Treasury states the conditions of the subscriptions as follows: "The original certificate, (of deposit,) which should be left with you (the bank) after indorsement, as herein directed, must be sent to this Department, and must state on the back the denomination of the notes wanted, and whether they are to be issued in blank or payable to order. The notes will be in denominations of $50, $100, $500, $1,000, and $5,000; and, when prepared, they will be sent to your bank for distribution to depositors, by express, at the expense of the Government." Deposits, when made, were placed to the credit of the Treasurer of the United States. August 19, 1864, notice was given in a Saint Albans paper, by agents of the Treasury Department, that subscriptions would be received to said loan by the First National Bank at Saint Albans, and other places mentioned. The notice specified that "the notes will be transmitted to the owners free of transportation charges, as soon after the receipt of the original certificates of deposit as they can be prepared."

The subscriptions were made upon the condition that the notes when prepared should be sent to the bank, for distribution to depositors, by express, at the expense of the Government. The raiders robbed the bank and prevented the Government from distributing the bonds The subscribers paid their money for the bonds, and it went into the Treasury. There being no default on their part, they should suffer no loss. As the bank refunded the money to the subscribers, we are of opinion that it has an equitable claim against the Government. We therefore report back the Senate bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I should like to have a further explanation than is contained in the report.

Mr. EDEN. I am willing to explain the bill.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the committee investigated the facts?

Mr. EDEN. The committee did investigate the facts. There is no dispute about them at all.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Did the committee have any correspondence with the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. EDEN. It did.

Mr. O'BRIEN. What was his opinion?

Mr. EDEN. These bonds were taken from the First National Bank of Saint Albans by raiders. They were issued in blank; not payable to any particular person. When they came to the Treasury Department, the Government redeemed them rather than run the risk of impairing the credit of the bonds. This bank was simply acting as an agent for the Government. If gentlemen paid any attention to the reading of the report they would be in possession of all the facts.

Now, sir, under the banking laws, the Government has a right to demand national banks shall act as financial agents in the negotiation of loans. This bank, having been designated for that purpose, proceeded to receive subscriptions. The money subscribed was placed to the credit of the Government and drawn out on drafts from the Treasury. By the terms of the subscriptions the Government was to deliver the bonds. Those who lived in the immediate vicinity went and got their bonds before the raid occurred. The bonds were received on Saturday, and the raid occurred on Wednesday following. The amounts of bonds specified in the bill remained in the custody of the bank, and the raiders captured and carried them off. Notice was immediately given and a caveat filed in the Treasury Department by officers of the bank to stop the payment of the bonds. When the bonds came to the Treasury, however, as I have already stated, they were paid or converted into other securities. No notice was given to the bank, and no opportunity afforded to show that the parties presenting the bonds had notice they had been stolen. No chance was given to the bank to make proof.

The bank paid the money to the subscribers, and now asks the Government to indemnify it for that payment. The bank never owned the bonds, had no interest in the bonds, was simply acting as agent under the law to deliver the bonds which the Government had obligated itself to deliver to the subscribers by the terms of the subscription.

Mr. HENDEE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it did not appear that there was no fault or neglect on the part of the bank officers, and if it was not the fact that it was not in their power to prevent the taking of these bonds by the raiders?

Mr. EDEN. Unquestionably so. There was no lache on the part of the officers of the bank They followed the raiders up immediately into Canada and captured them, but the courts in Canada held that these raiders were belligerents, holding in Canada a commission under the confederate government. Subsequently a portion of the stolen money was given up, but the bank lost a large amount of money. It does not ask the Government to refund the money. That was its loss. It only asks the Government to suffer the loss on account of the capture of the bonds, the bonds having been afterward paid by the Government.

I now yield to the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE,] who is familiar with the matter, if he desires to make any further statement in regard to it.

Mr. HENDEE. Mr. Speaker, the chairman of the committee to which this matter was referred has made a very full statement of the case, but I would like to add a little, with the permission of the Committee of the Whole.

The history of this affair is of course somewhat interesting, and although it is well known to the country, perhaps I might mention one or two facts connected with it. The Saint Albans raid, as it is called, which occurred in 1864, was organized under the instrumentality or by the direct authority of C. C. Clay, jr., and Jacob Thompson, who were agents of the confederate government, resident in Canada for that and other purposes. The report says that the men who came to Saint Albans for the purpose of robbing the banks there were confederate soldiers; so that we claim that the acts of these men were virtually acts of war.

Now, in the first place, this claim was presented to the British and American mixed claims commission for adjustment. That commission decided that inasmuch as this band of men were not organized, the British government was not to blame for the robbery or the taking of these bonds. Hence, the claim was disallowed, and by that tribunal; the pendency of the claim before that commission is the reason why it has not been presented to Congress before this day, though it was presented at the last Congress, but not reached.

This is no new principle. The principle sought to be recognized in this bill has been established by Congress a great many times in refunding to paymasters and postmasters and other Government officers money which has been taken from them, being the property of the United States, without fault or neglect upon their part. And in my remarks I will mention some of the cases which have been decided that are very similar to this case.

I would refer the committee to the following cases which have been favorably considered by former Congresses:

Act to relieve D. O. Cleveland, P. M. (Laws of 1873, page 722.)
Act to relieve A. A. Vance, P. M. (Laws of 1871, page 699.)
An act to relieve John S. Cunningham, paymaster United States Navy. (Laws of 1868, page 358.) This case was for public money stolen.
An act to relieve James Fulton, paymaster United States Navy, for clothes and small stores stolen. (Laws of 1867, page 636.)
Joint resolution to pay J. N. Carpenter, paymaster United States Navy, for clothing stolen. (Laws of 1864, page 587.)
Act to pay John H. Ellis, paymaster United States Army, for larceny of public money. (Laws of 1868, page 356.)
The rule has also been extended to mail contractors for horses captured by rebel forces and guerrillas during the war. (See joint resolution to pay John R. Beckley. Laws of 1867, page 644.)
Congress has also relieved collectors of internal revenue in cases of larceny of public money. (See act for relief of Robert Williams, jr., collector third district of Ohio. Laws of 1872, page 660.)
It has also relieved superintendents of branch mints for public moneys stolen from the Mint. (Joint resolution to pay George W. Lane. Laws of 1869, page 463.)
It has also relieved sub-treasurers where defalcations have occurred on the part of subordinate officers of the sub-treasury.
It has also paid losses of private individuals sustained at the hands of the public enemy during the rebellion. (See case of Margaret Merkin. Laws of 1873, page 767.)
It has also paid Thomas C. Magruder money stolen from him belonging to the Government, after the same had been refunded by him to the Government. (Laws of 1873, page 765.)
It has likewise relieved United States depositaries of public moneys stolen from them. (See joint resolution to relieve John L. Thomas, jr., and E. H. Webster, designated depositaries of the United States at Baltimore. Laws of 1871, page 703. See also an act for relief of John Hastings, late depositary of public moneys at Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, for moneys robbed from him in 1854. Laws of 1866, page 605. See also an act for the relief of John T. Mason, late United States designated depositary at Baltimore, Maryland, for moneys paid into the Treasury by him, the amount of which was afterward shown to have been stolen or embezzled by his late clerk in said depositary. Laws of 1873, page 723.)

And as bearing on this case under consideration, I will cite the language of the Supreme Court in the case of United States vs. Thomas, 15 Wallace, page 337:

The late rebellion being a public war, the forcible seizure by the rebel authorities of public moneys in the hands of loyal Government agents against their will, and without their fault or negligence, was a sufficient discharge from their obligations in reference to said moneys.

These are the points of the case: In the first place, the bonds which were taken, to the amount of $28,650, were the property of the United States. They were in the hands of the First National Bank of Saint Albans as a designated depository; or, in other words, the bank was merely the agent of the Government for the delivery of the bonds to the subscribers. Now, the committee will remember that the act which established these banks compelled them to become depositories of United States bonds and money. It also compelled the banks to receive subscriptions for the 7.30 bonds of the issue of 1864. In pursuance of that law the Government of the United States called upon this bank to receive subscriptions for these bonds, what are known as the 7.30 three-year bonds of 1864. The bank did receive subscriptions from the inhabitants in the vicinity of the bank to the amount of $35,000. The Government was notified and forwarded the bonds to the bank for delivery to the subscribers. But before the subscribers could receive their bonds or the bank could deliver them, this raid occurred and the bonds were taken from the bank. Now, if the committee is satisfied that there was no fault and no neglect on the part of the bank in protecting that property, as a matter of course it should be relieved from loss.

I would further say that at the same time that these bonds were taken $12,000 in money in the bank was also taken, which they never have recovered, and of course they alone have and must suffer that loss. Further, they have been kept out of the use of this $28,650 for the term of twelve years. If the interest was paid the whole would amount to fifty-odd thousand dollars. That they do not seek to recover. They simply ask the Government to pay back to them just the amount of bonds taken from the bank which were the property of the United States.

I think the principle of law is well established that—

An officer or "agent" of the Government is only bound to exercise "a degree of care and diligence as the custodian of public moneys or securities which a careful, prudent man would require of his agent in a matter of private interest or exercise in his own affairs," and is only liable for negligence or dishonesty.

Mr. STONE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Vermont to state to the House how much money in the aggregate was taken from the First National Bank of Saint Albans? The report says that $74,000 of the stolen money was recovered.

Mr. HENDEE. The raiders took about $100,000, if I remember rightly.

Mr. STONE. And the bank recovered $74,000?

Mr. HENDEE. They recovered all but $12,000 of the money, saying nothing about these bonds; or perhaps I should say they lost $12,000 in money, and these bonds amounted to $28,650, and I think more.

I will be glad to add that I am personally acquainted with all the gentlemen connected with this bank, and can say that they are gentlemen of the highest order of character. Their affidavits are on file here, and can be examined by the gentleman if he wishes.

Mr. STONE. How will the bank determine what proportion of this sum belongs to them and what to the bonds?

Mr. HENDEE. The affidavits show that very conclusively, and the report, I think, is conclusive upon that point.

Mr. STONE. The report does not do it, and therefore I desire information from the gentleman so that I may vote intelligently.

Mr. HENDEE. The report may not show that, but I will state that the bank did suffer a loss absolutely of $12,000, over and above what it recovered back, besides the loss of these bonds. I think there can be no objection to the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

PAYMENT OF CLAIMS.

The next business on the Calendar was the bill in the nature of a substitute to the bill (H. R. No. 1218) making appropriations for the payment of claims reported to Congress under section 2 of the act approved June 16, 1874, by the Secretary of the Treasury, namely: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following.

Mr. STONE. Is there any report accompanying this bill?

Mr. EDEN. I want to ask the indulgence of the House to say a word in reference to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can do that after the bill has been read.

Mr. EDEN. But I do not want it read if it can be avoided.

The CHAIRMAN. The reading of the bill can be dispensed with by unanimous consent.

Mr. EDEN. It is a very long bill—a bill of nineteen printed pages, and the principal part of it consists of the names of claimants and the amounts due them.

The CHAIRMAN. The rule requires that the bill shall first be read at length.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill, as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and required to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the several persons in this act named, the several sums mentioned therein, the same being in full for, and the receipt of the same to be taken and accepted in each case as a full and final discharge of, the several claims examined and allowed by the proper accounting officers since June 30, 1874, under the second section of the act of Congress approved June 16, 1874, namely——

Mr. EDEN. I apprehend that the reading of the names and amounts can be dispensed with by common consent.

Mr. STONE. I object to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] suggests that the schedule be not read unless desired by the committee. If the reading of the bill is called for, it must be read at length. If there be no objection, the schedule of the names and amounts will not be read.

Mr. STONE. I have asked for the reading of the bill at length.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman require the reading of the names and amounts?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands.

Mr. STONE. I desire to have it read.

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman will allow me to make an explanation about this bill I am sure he will withdraw his demand.

Mr. STONE. I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. EDEN. The amounts that are embraced in this bill are for the payment of accounts which have been passed upon by the accounting officers of the Treasury. This bill was before the House in the last Congress. It passed the Committee on War Claims without any opposition. It came into the House and was passed unanimously without the reading of anything but the title and sent to the Senate, but, it being near the close of the session, it failed to receive action in the Senate.

The law originally provided that these claims should be paid upon the recommendation of the accounting officers of the Treasury, without any action of Congress at all; but in an appropriation bill passed June 16, 1874, the law was changed, and now these accounts are sent to Congress for an appropriation.

This bill has been printed, and has been before the Committee of the Whole for three weeks or more. It was called once before on "objection day," and a single objection carried it over. If there is any gentleman upon this floor who wants to examine and see whether these accounts are correct or not, if he will go down into the room of the Committee on War Claims he will find a very large number of them down there; and if they were put in his hands for six months, and he was required to go over them and see whether the accounts were correct or not, I doubt very much whether he would throw any more light on the subject than the accounting officers of the Treasury have thrown on it. The accounts have passed through the Quartermaster's Department and through the Auditor's Office in the regular way that all accounts are passed in the Treasury; and until the passage of the act of 1874, to which I have referred, and which I desire to have read, the amount found due was paid without any action of Congress at all; and I apprehend that when that law was passed it was not intended that the members of this House should take up the papers in three or four hundred cases, some of them probably containing fifty, sixty, or one hundred pages of testimony, and go over the several accounts to see whether they are correct.

We have either got to rely upon the action of the accounting officers and make an appropriation upon that action, unless anything comes to light showing that there is something wrong in an account, or else these creditors of the Government have got to go without their money.

I venture to say that if Congress should refuse to pay these poor people for property taken and used by the Army under laws that authorizes payment therefor at the time it was taken, it will be just as much repudiation as repudiation of the bonds of the Government would be, and unless gentlemen intend that they will pass this bill after it has been examined by two committees of two different Congresses, otherwise they will repudiate this debt.

Mr. BRIGHT. What is the average amount of the claims allowed by this bill?

Mr. EDEN. I think about $100.

Mr. BRIGHT. What is the aggregate amount?

Mr. EDEN. About $112,000.

Mr. STONE. The gentleman said that if any one desired to look into these matters it would take him six months to do it.

Mr. EDEN. Yes; if he looked into them thoroughly.

Mr. STONE. I would ask the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, [Mr. EDEN,] reporting this bill, if he has thoroughly examined each and all of these claims?

Mr. EDEN. In answer to the gentleman I will say that, nothing appearing to the contrary, I took it for granted that the accounting officers of the Treasury have acted honestly.

Mr. STONE. No doubt about that. But the gentleman said it would take six months to examine into these claims.

Mr. EDEN. If you go over all the papers it will take that long.

Mr STONE. Has the Committee on War Claims gone over all the papers and evidence in these cases?

Mr. EDEN. It has not.

Mr. STONE. Does the committee make any report on these claims?

Mr. EDEN. It reports this bill. I ask the Clerk to read section 2 of the act of June 16, 1874.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That all balances of appropriations for whatever account, made for the service of the Departments of the Quartermaster-General and of the Commissary-General of Subsistence prior to July 1, 1872, which on the 30th day of June, 1874, shall remain on the books of the Treasury, shall be carried to the surplus fund, except such as the Auditor of the Treasury whose duty it is to settle accounts against such appropriations shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury to be necessary in the settlement of such accounts as have been reported to him for payment by the Quartermaster and the Commissary Departments pending in his Office. And the Quartermaster-General, Commissary-General, and Third Auditor of the Treasury shall continue to receive, examine, and consider the justice and validity of such claims as shall be brought before them under the act of July 4, 1864, and the acts amendatory thereof; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall make report of each claim allowed by them, at the commencement of each session of Congress, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall lay the same before Congress for consideration.

Mr. EDEN. In order to show how these claims were paid prior to the passage of the act just read, I desire the Clerk to read the law in operation before that time.

Mr. BRIGHT. By order of the House a recess is to be taken at half past four o'clock. There are but a few minutes left in which to report to the House and act upon the bills which this committee have directed to be favorably reported to the House. I ask the gentleman to yield now that I may move that the committee rise and report to the House the bills favorably acted upon.

Mr. EDEN. I will yield for that motion.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now submit the motion I have indicated.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. COX having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. SPRINGER reported that, pursuant to the order of the House, the Committee of the Whole had had under consideration the Private Calendar, and had directed him to report sundry bills to the House, with a favorable recommendation.

DISPENSING WITH NIGHT SESSION.

Mr. RANDALL. As is known to members, there is to be a caucus of the members of this side of the House to-night. It has been suggested to me by many members on the other side that they do not desire to be brought here to-night for a brief period only. I therefore ask unanimous consent of the House that the session of to-night be dispensed with, and that the session of this afternoon be continued beyond half past four o'clock, so that the House may be able to dispose of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House will now proceed to the consideration of the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

MARY W. JONES.

The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LANDS CEDED UNDER TREATY OF WASHINGTON.

The next bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was the following, with amendments:

A bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FIRST NATIONAL BANK OF SAINT ALBANS.

The last bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was as follows:

A bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill; and being taken, upon a division there were—ayes 41, noes 27.

Mr. STONE. No quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted, tellers will be appointed if a further count is insisted upon.

Mr. STONE. I call for a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. EDEN and Mr. STONE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported that there were ayes 86, noes not counted.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. EDEN. I move to reconsider the various votes by which the bills reported from the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar have been passed; and I also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHIEF CLERK OF THE HOUSE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. At the request of the SPEAKER, the Chair lays before the House a communication which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CLERK'S OFFICE, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., March 31, 1876.

SIR: I notice in the RECORD of day before yesterday, the 29th instant, the following remarks purporting to have been made by Hon. J. D. WHITE, of Kentucky, in reference to myself:

"Knowing as I did of a charge of corruption made against Hon. Green Adams, now Chief Clerk of this House, while he was Sixth Auditor of the Treasury, for appropriating several thousands of dollars to his own use which should have been paid into the Treasury, since the money was the proceeds of the sales of waste-paper which belonged to the Government—I say that, being cognizant of these facts, it struck me as a little bit amusing that this man Green Adams should be the officer of this pure democratic House to carry articles of impeachment from here over to the Senate. He was a republican then, but you took him from us and rewarded him with a high office."

The facts in regard to the matter thus alluded to are as follows:

In the year 1864 I resigned the office of Sixth Auditor of the Treasury for the purpose of accepting the office of Treasury agent for the purchase of products of insurrectionary States, at Nashville, Tennessee, and hurriedly left for the performance of the duties of the new office to which I had been appointed, without making or pretending to make any final settlement of my accounts with my successor, who had not then been appointed, and who I had good reason to believe would not be appointed for some time thereafter; leaving, however, on file in the Auditor's Office, over my own signature, receipts for all moneys received by me on account of waste-paper or otherwise.

After the lapse of some time an Auditor was appointed, who found on file my receipts and reported to the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Fessenden, that there was a balance due from me to the Office, and thereupon, my attention being called to the fact, the amount found due from me to the Office was promptly paid over to my successor and his receipt taken therefor.

From that time to this I am not aware that any one has ever seriously charged me with anything improper in connection with this matter; and, whatever may be the supicions of others, it is certain that Mr. Fessenden, who was then Secretary of the Treasury and was cognizant of all the facts, never charged or even suspected me of any impropriety or attempted impropriety in this connection, but, on the contrary, manifested his entire confidence in my integrity and uprightness of character by retaining me in the responsible office of purchasing agent and placing to my credit large sums of money to be used by me for the Government.

I have thought proper to state this much in explanation of the matter thus alluded to, and respectfully request in justice to myself that this communication be laid before the House of Representatives.

I am not conscious of ever having appropriated to my own use any money belonging to the Government and will esteem it a favor to have thoroughly investigated any charge of this kind which any one may see proper to make against me.

Very respectfully,

GREEN ADAMS.

Hon. M. C. KERR,
Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. BOONE. I move that the communication just read be referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, with instructions to investigate and report whether or not the charges made by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] are true or false.

Mr. WHITE. I second that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

VENTILATION OF THE HALL.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to discharge the present engineer and appoint some competent person in his place.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to have this resolution referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds for the purpose of having an early report upon this subject. I do not know this engineer, nor do I know anything as to the truth of the statement which I find in the papers, that he is endeavoring to demonstrate the insufficiency of our heating and ventilating apparatus, in order to have the House adopt some other system of heating and ventilation. I know nothing about these things; but I do say that if he had desired to introduce a system of torture he could hardly have accomplished the result more successfully than he has done for the last few weeks. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that resolution.

Mr. SPRINGER. I only ask its reference.

Mr. CONGER. Well, I object to its reference, for there is already a committee investigating this man's conduct.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is not this a question of privilege?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot recognize it as such.

REAL-ESTATE-POOL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 24th day of January, A. D. 1876, the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said real-estate pool and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in settlement, with power to send for persons and papers and report to this House."

Be it resolved, That said committee be further authorized and directed to likewise investigate any and all matters touching the official misconduct of any officer of the Government of the United States or of any member of the present Congress of the United States which may come to the knowledge of said committee: Provided, That this resolution shall not affect any such matter now being investigated by any other committee under authority of either House of Congress; and for this purpose said committee shall have the same powers to send for persons and papers, to inspect and examine respectively, as conferred by said original resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I object.

PAYMENT OF HOUSE EMPLOYÉS AND WITNESSES.

Mr. DENISON. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for reference to the Committee on Appropriations.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that the employés of Congress and witnesses called before the committees do not promptly receive their pay, but certain of them are offering to sell their claims for much less than the face value of the same, for the reason that no funds are appropriated to make said payment: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Appropriations be requested to inquire without delay what amount of appropriation is necessary to supply the deficiency and report by bill as soon as practicable, to prevent any further default in said payments.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to state that the Committee on Appropriations are considering that subject and would have passed upon it to-day but for the fact that they had not the itemized account as to all the deficiencies. It is the purpose of the committee at once to prepare a bill to provide for all the deficiencies, and this will be included.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the reference of the resolution to the Committee on Appropriations?

There was no objection, and it was referred accordingly.

ESAU PICKRELL AND OTHERS.

Mr. RANDALL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 2955) for the relief of Esau Pickrell and the legal representatives of William H. Eades, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DANFORD until April 5 on account of sickness; to Mr. PHELPS for ten days from next Monday on account of important business; to Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, until next Wednesday on account of important business; and to Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina, for ten days from next Monday.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

Mr. CONGER. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn till next Monday.

Mr. RANDALL. O, no! I hope not. There is a special assignment for to-morrow.

Mr. SAYLER. Yes, sir; and for a matter of very great importance: the steamboat bill.

The motion was not agreed to; there being ayes 27, noes not counted.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BAKER, of Indiana: The petition of J. H. Ray and 45 others engaged in the cultivation and manufacture of flaxseed and oil therefrom, in Indiana, that no change be made in the duty on such seed and oil of foreign growth and manufacture, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. BLAIR: Memorial of the Society for the Better Protection of Animals of the county of Cheshire, New Hampshire, for legislation providing for the humane treatment of animals when being transported over the railway routes of the country, to the Committee on Agriculture.

By Mr. BURLEIGH: The petition of Hayes & Douglas and others, of Portland, Maine, importers and dealers in crockery, china, and glassware, that a uniform rate of 30 per cent. be levied upon earthenware, crockery, china, and glass ware, exclusive of packages, land freight, shipping charges, and commissions, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. COCHRANE: Memorial of citizens of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, that the present tariff laws remain undisturbed, to the same committee.

By Mr. COX: The petition of E. & J. Karelson, to strike glaziers' diamonds from the free list, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of A. A. Low and other merchants of New York, against the repeal of the bankrupt law, to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CRAPO: The petition of Captain Joseph Bayles and many other shipmasters, for the passage of the proposed law abolishing compulsory pilotage, to the Committee on Commerce.

Also, the petition of Van Brunt & Brothers and numerous merchants and firms of New York and Jersey City, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. DANFORD: The petition of J. T. Whipple and others, of Perry County, Ohio, for the equalization of bounty, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of citizens of Casey County, Kentucky, that the charges against General Franklin L. Wolford be removed, and that he be honorably discharged from the service of the United States, to the same committee.

By Mr. FAULKNER: The petition of 302 citizens of Harper's Ferry and of the county of Jefferson, West Virginia, that immediate steps be taken for the sale of the water power of the Government property at Harper's Ferry, to the same committee.

By Mr. HOPKINS: Three petitions of workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, against a reduction of the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. HUNTON: The petition of Ellen G. Slemaker, of Washington, District of Columbia, for the correction of an erroneous award of the southern claims commission, to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. KNOTT: Papers relating to the claim of Jacob Kaufman, for goods taken and destroyed during the late war by Federal soldiers. to the same committee.

By Mr. McMAHON: The petition of Philip Levasseur, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NEAL: The petition of T. E. De Bruin and 32 other soldiers of the late war, that $200 in money be granted them in lieu of a land warrant, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, North Carolina, favoring the organization of the Signal Service as a distinct corps, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania: The petition of J. P. Morris Iron-Works Company and 80 other citizens of Philadelphia, against any change in the present tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. THOMPSON: The petition of Alfred Kittridge and 30 others, of Haverhill and Bradford, Massachusetts, that greenbacks shall be received by the United States for all duties on imports, to the same committee.

By Mr. THROCKMORTON: Papers relating to the claim of John T. Morris, for compensation for the apprehension of parties concerned in mail robberies in Texas, to the Committee of Claims.

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York: A paper relating to a post-route from Nassau to Niverville, Columbia County, via the village of North Chatham, in the same county, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. TURNEY: The petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, for the establishment of a post-route from Manor Station, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, via Adamsburgh, Cribbs, New Stanton, Waltz's Mill, Madison, Fulton, Aronia, thence to Adamsburgh and Manor Station, the place of starting, to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE, of Ohio: The petition of E. E. Ewing, of Portsmouth, Ohio, that a uniform duty of 30 per cent. be levied upon earthenware, crockery, china, and glass ware, exclusive of package, shipping charges, and commissions, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: Resolutions of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, North Carolina, favoring the organization of the Signal Service as a distinct corps, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. WELLS, of Missouri: The petition of wholesale dealers in and manufacturers of distilled spirits of Saint Louis, Missouri, for the definition of the powers and duties of officers of internal revenue, and to further provide for the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York: The petition of James H. Signor, B. F. Jackson, and 55 others, against any change in the tariff at this time, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of E. Fairbanks, Wilbur Smith, and 82 others, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. WOODWORTH: The petition of Mrs. Sydney J. Wood, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, April 1, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

BELKNAP IMPEACHMENT.

Mr. HUNTON. The chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, [Mr. KNOTT,] who is unavoidably detained from the House to-day on the business of the House, has requested me to give notice he will call up the articles of impeachment of the late Secretary of War on Monday next immediately after the morning hour.

CONCRETE PAVEMENT FOR PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. MOREY. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, to introduce, by request, a resolution for reference to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be directed to examine and report at the earliest practicable moment which of the concrete or asphalt pavements laid under contract with the authorities of the District of Columbia has proven to be the most durable, and report the cost for laying the same on Pennsylvania avenue from First to Fifteenth streets northwest, together with their recommendation.

The resolution was received, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

RELIEF FOR WASHINGTON PROPERTY-HOLDERS.

Mr. HENKLE, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of certain property-holders in Washington, asking for relief; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. REAGAN. I now call up the special order for this day.

The SPEAKER. The special order for to-day is the consideration of a bill (H. R. No. 2799) to amend certain sections of titles 48 and 52 of the Revised Statutes of the United States concerning commerce and navigation and the regulation of steam-vessels, reported from the Committee on Commerce by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] Is it the pleasure of the House that the bill shall be read a first time for information?

Mr. REAGAN. I will not ask that, as the bill has been already gone over; but, on the contrary, I ask it be read section by section for amendment under the five-minute rule as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. This bill has been made the special order for to-day, and is to be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. There being no objection, the first reading of the bill for information will be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, in the first section, which has just been read, there are a great many amendments of different sections of the Revised Statutes, all of which are important. It seems to me we should consider each amendment of the Revised Statutes by itself, as it is set forth in each separate clause of the bill.

Mr. REAGAN. That certainly would be the most convenient way of considering the bill.

The SPEAKER. The proper way to consider this bill for amendment would be by paragraph, and not by section.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that will be the course taken.

Mr. HALE. I rose after the Clerk commenced reading line 12. If there has been any understanding reached as to the mode of proceeding I did not quite catch it, as my attention was directed elsewhere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. BLACKBURN in the chair.) The Clerk will begin the reading of the first portion of the bill over again, and amendments will be in order at the end of each paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

That section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be amended by inserting, after the third line in said section, the words:

"And by all foreign vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States."

Mr. LYNDE. I hope that the amendment now proposed by this bill will not be adopted by the House. I will state the rules sought to be amended are rules of navigation which were adopted in Great Britain in 1863, and subsequently in 1865, I think, were first adopted by the American Congress. These rules have been adopted now by all the commercial nations of the world. The language used in them has been frequently adjudicated by our courts of admiralty and by all the commercial courts in the world. It seems to me, therefore, to be bad policy in Congress to introduce new language in place of that originally used in these rules.

This paragraph now sought to be incorporated into this act, it seems to me, would involve us in difficulties, and at the same time accomplish no good. The statute as it reads at the present time is the following:

The following rules for preventing collisions on the water shall be followed in the navigation of vessels of the Navy and of the mercantile marine of the United States.

Now, we have a right to make rules of navigation that will apply to our own Navy and the mercantile marine of the United States, but as to foreign vessels I think we have no right, except they have adopted similar rules in the country to which those vessels belong. I believe that rule has been laid down by the courts. I have not examined the decisions which have been made on this particular clause of the act, but there have been several decisions made by the Supreme Court as to how far these rules have been applicable to foreign vessels. As the statute now reads, it has been construed and is well understood. I know of no evil existing under it and I see no propriety in amending it.

Mr. REAGAN. The committee have carefully examined this subject; and the particular change to which the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has referred had in view to give the greatest practicable security to life, person, and property on vessels within the waters of the United States. In order to do that they aimed to bring within our navigation rules, as provided for by this amendment, and others that will be reached as we proceed, foreign vessels within the waters of the United States.

It perhaps did not attract the attention of the gentleman from Wisconsin that I explained in presenting the bill on a former day that in making this change we followed the change in the British shipping and navigation laws. They make our vessels—and I understand the same is the case with reference to other foreign governments—they make our vessels in their waters in this and in many other respects that I will point out, if called upon, subject to their laws when in their waters. The reason of this will be very readily seen. If our vessels in our waters are bound by particular rules and the vast number of foreign ships in the same waters are released from obligation to obey these rules, it will be seen that continual collisions and disasters may be the result. The object of this amendment is to avoid this, and make all the vessels, except the public vessels of foreign countries, observe the rules for navigating the waters of the United States. Both as a matter of expediency, and because it conforms to the British law on this subject, and because it was stated by many of large experience and information upon this subject that it was necessary, the committee without dissent adopted the amendment which will make the section when amended read as follows:

The following rules for preventing collisions on the waters shall be followed in the navigation of vessels of the Navy and of the mercantile marine of the United States and by all foreign vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States.

The words "and by all foreign vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States" are the words that are added by the amendment in the bill.

Mr. HARRISON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas one question. Should not the language be "in waters within the jurisdiction of the United States?"

Mr. REAGAN. Vessels are not apt to navigate the land.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true; but will there not be a difficulty? What puts a vessel within the jurisdiction of the United States?

Mr. REAGAN. We followed the language, I believe, of the British shipping act. It may be possible that the sense might be made more complete, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] suggests, but it was not deemed to be necessary by the committee to adopt that fullness of expression.

Mr. LYNDE. I understand the British act to provide that wherever any commercial nation has adopted the same rules, then these rules adopted by the British government shall be applied in their courts to the vessels of those other nations; but where a commercial nation has failed to adopt the rules, then the English courts do not apply these statutory regulations to control their adjudications.

I understand the law of navigation, as it is generally interpreted by the courts of admiralty, to be a part of the law of nations, and that no one nation can lay down a new rule as applicable to vessels belonging to a foreign government even within its own waters, for a vessel of any government is a part of and carries with it all of the rights of the nation to which it belongs. And therefore, although the British government has adopted that rule as to our Government, it is because we have adopted the same rules which they have laid down.

I therefore can see no possible benefit to be derived from this amendment. The rule as it is now laid down is well understood. It is applicable to all nations who have adopted the same rules of navigation that we have adopted, and they have been adopted by almost all of the commercial nations of the world. I was glancing my eye over the list to-day, and I find that there are twenty-eight of the commercial nations of the earth which have adopted these rules; but we must not apply these rules to nations which have not adopted them.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say just one word before the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] takes the floor.

It seems to me, with all deference to the learning of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] that he is proceeding in his argument on the assumption that the privilege of foreign vessels to navigate American waters or of American vessels to navigate foreign waters is a matter of right. He forgets that it is but matter of comity and subject to the authority of the country whose waters are navigated. And while it is so a matter of comity, every nation reserves to itself the right, independent of the authority or consent of any other nation, to prescribe the rules for the navigation of its waters. The gentleman speaks of these rules as having been adopted, as if they were adopted by a sort of general consent; that is, the consent of each nation depending upon the consent of some other. In that view I apprehend the gentleman is totally mistaken.

The British government did not inquire of the United States Government whether they would consent to the laws which were in force, as the gentleman from Wisconsin mentioned, before this rule was adopted; nor did they ask for our consent or approval for the modification of the rule subjecting American vessels to the British navigation laws in British waters. This being so, it seems to me there can be no just foundation for the gentleman's objection. And, in addition to that, expediency and necessity, the safety of commerce, the safety of shipping, the safety of life, depend on the uniformity of the rules applicable to all vessels navigating our waters, if this can be secured in conformity with law and without offense to other nations.

In the great port of New York, or of New Orleans, or of San Francisco, or in ports on the lakes where there are so many vessels, if a portion of them are navigated under the laws of the United States and another portion navigated under the laws of another country, and where there are just as many systems of navigation laws as there are vessels hailing from different countries, the rules of which may be in conflict with one another, it must necessarily produce collisions and loss of life and property. I think the amendment is a good one.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the last word. There are some reasons why such an amendment as this should be adopted now which have never existed at any previous period when these laws have been under consideration.

This is a bill to provide for the security of life and property. It is a system of rules, regulations, and laws for the preservation of property and the security of life on our navigable waters. At the time when the laws on this subject were revised in 1871 and embodied in an act then passed by Congress, it was desired to embrace within the provisions of that law all the vessels which navigated the waters of the United States within our jurisdiction. Many desired at that time to incorporate this same provision in the law, but for some reason it was not thought best. This provision is so worded that the rules will apply only to vessels within the jurisdiction of the United States; that is, on the ocean within a marine league or within our harbors. But since that time, by the treaty of Washington, some of our inland waters have been opened to the commerce of other nations entirely as much as our own, and that, too, in cases of inland waters entirely within our own jurisdiction, like Lake Michigan for instance; that treaty gives to some foreign vessels an absolute right in the coast trade and navigation within our inland waters which was not before given.

Now, the result of controlling foreign vessels in our harbors, on our lakes, or our rivers, is to make stringent rules to protect property and preserve life. Unless we apply to foreign vessels entering our harbors the same rules followed by our own vessels, the vessels of every nation may enter our harbors, endanger the lives of our people and the lives of passengers on the foreign vessels, and endanger property just as much as if one-half of our own vessels were exempt from the operation of the rule. It will create great confusion. In my judgment this is a very wise provision, and therefore it was my judgment that it should have been adopted even before the extension of the rights of navigation of our waters to foreign nations.

I will say that in the main these rules are copies of the English admiralty rules on the same subject, copies in the main of the French rules, and of the rules of all the maritime nations. The differences are so slight in our own rules—applying more to the river navigation of the Mississippi in special rules in relation to that river—the differences are so slight, that foreign vessels without extra expenses and with very little additional study may conform themselves to our rules.

I may say in conclusion that in my opinion the necessity of having these rules enforced by law on foreign vessels in the harbor of New York, on the Hudson River, on the Mississippi, but, far more, on our inland lakes, has become so apparent, that I should hesitate long before I would oppose an amendment like this; and I am surprised that my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. LYNDE,] representing as he does more particularly the interior lakes, should object to this amendment. I should hesitate before objecting unless some better reasons were given than I have yet heard.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. LYNDE. Mr. Speaker, I renew the amendment. The gentleman should be aware at any rate that these rules of navigation are applicable to all vessels navigating our lakes. The same rules are adopted by the British government as by our Government, and the same rules apply to all commercial nations; but the British government, before they applied the rules to any other than their own vessels, required that due notice should be given that those rules had been adopted by such other nations, and they were notified by our Government and all other governments when the rules were adopted by those governments. The court of admiralty applied the rules then to foreign vessels, but in New York there are very few vessels that enter that do not come subject to these rules, because the governments to which the vessels belong have already adopted the same rules.

But what I object to is the broad language used in this amendment, making it apply to the vessels of all foreign nations, whether they have adopted similar rules or not.

I do not believe we have a right to adopt rules of navigation for foreign vessels except so far as similar rules have been adopted by the country to which those vessels belong. It is true we have the right to adopt police regulations in our several harbors, such as requiring all vessels to have pilots on board. We have not the right to lay down a long series of rules as to the manner in which these vessels shall be navigated or as to the lights they shall carry unless the governments of the countries to which they belong shall have adopted similar rules.

Mr. REAGAN. I would say to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] that if he will look at the paragraph he will see that it is not necessary for him to argue the broad question he is arguing. It relates only to the rules in one section of the Revised Statutes, and not to all the rules that are contained in the statutes upon this subject.

Mr. LYNDE. This paragraph relates to everything which I have suggested, to the manner in which vessels shall be navigated in order to avoid collisions, to the lights they shall carry, and the manner in which those lights shall be carried. I think the law as it now stands, having been interpreted by the admiralty courts, not only of our country but of all commercial nations, is much safer and better than the amendment proposed by this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the pending amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill is reported as a substitute for a bill originally introduced by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.] If there is any objection to it the proper motion would be to strike out something contained in this bill.

Mr. CONGER. Any amendment to the bill must be to strike out or to insert something. It is not necessary to call for a vote upon any particular paragraph which has been read, and I believe no amendment has been offered to the pending paragraph.

Mr. LYNDE. I move to strike out the pending paragraph.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That in rule 15, titles B and C, the word "five" shall be stricken out and the word "two" inserted.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend by adding to the clause just read the following:

That in rule 15, title B, after the word "fog-horn," insert the words "which may be heard at the distance of one mile."

I think this is a good bill in almost every respect, and I do not mean to antagonize it except in certain small particulars.

Mr. CONGER. Would not the gentleman be willing to move his amendment to the last clause of the rule, and not to the paragraph pending?

Mr. HALE. I propose to offer it to title D, also, when we reach that.

Mr. CONGER. Title D is intended to cover all these others, and therefore an amendment there would apply to all the others.

Mr. HALE. I am not certain it would cover both.

Mr. CONGER. It is intended to cover all the preceding clauses in relation to fog-horns.

Mr. HALE. It is only as a matter of security. There are certain things that I think may, perhaps, have been overlooked by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] which bear severely upon a class of our navigation interests that perhaps have not been heard in the make-up of this bill; that is, the class of small coasting and fishing vessels and boats that in many cases ply in waters where a steamboat is never seen nor heard. The provision of the bill that requires, for instance, that fog-horns shall be sounded every two minutes instead of every five minutes, or a bell to be sounded every two minutes instead of five, with a penalty annexed in some cases of $200, would become very onerous upon these small vessels. Now it is not at all essential to the bill that these extreme penalties should be inflicted.

Take, for instance, this amendment which I have offered. It is provided now that every sailing-vessel, she may be a little craft of five, or ten, or fifteen, or twenty tons burden, must be provided with a fog-horn with a power equal to a steam-whistle. Now that is not practicable; it is not a thing that can be done, unless you oblige these small vessels, owned by men who work hard to barely get a living, to purchase some patent fog-horn which some monopoly has got hold of, and which will cost them three or four times what they have been obliged to pay heretofore, in order to get one to equal a steam-whistle. The reed-horn that the little vessel has got, which will cost one and a half or two dollars, will be heard at the distance of a mile.

Now I do not believe that any gentleman here who is acquainted with this kind of craft and their business, and the needs of signaling and of sounding a fog-horn, which I admit, will object to my amendment which obliges the master of a small craft to sound a horn that may be heard for a mile. I hope the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] will not object to this amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I can conceive of the difficulty indicated by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] in regard to small vessels that are not brought in contact or liable to be brought into collision with other vessels. And if it were possible to make an amendment that would meet the case without producing danger elsewhere, I would have no objection to it.

We must understand, however, that this provision is intended to guard against collisions of vessels in thick and foggy weather. Where one vessel runs others may run. And we should not relax the rule. The amendment in title B is that sail-vessels, when under way in a fog, shall sound a fog-horn at intervals of not more than two minutes; and it is for the greater security, not only of steamers but of all vessels. It is deemed necessary for the reason that otherwise a vessel may not have sufficient or even any warning of its approach to other vessels. A steamer will run a mile or more in the time intervening between the fog-signals of a sailing-vessel as now fixed by law—that is, five minutes—while it may be impossible to hear such fog-signals at that distance. Thus the steamer may come upon the sailing-vessel without any warning whatever. If a sailing-vessel having a fair wind were moving toward a steamer at the same rate, the fog-signal to be effective under the present statute must be heard on board a steamer at a distance of two miles, which is practically impossible.

The same argument will apply to the amendment in title C. The object is security; and gentlemen will see the danger of requiring the necessary fog-signal to be sounded only every five minutes, instead of every two minutes. No one, perhaps, will controvert the statement I have made, that as the law now stands vessels approaching each other may be brought into collision if a fog-signal cannot be heard for two miles, which is impracticable. The object is to give security; and while the requirement now proposed may cause some little inconvenience, it is to be remembered that the security of vessels and their freight, the safety of the crew and passengers, is a matter of sufficient consequence to require us to provide the necessary means of security.

As to the strength of the fog-whistle, it should certainly be sufficient to be heard not less than a mile—which I believe is the distance indicated by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir.

Mr. REAGAN. But I desire it to be considered whether that will be sufficient to give the security which is sought.

Mr. HALE. My colleague here, [Mr. BURLEIGH,] who is a practical shipmaster, having sailed the sea for years, tells me that he thinks it ample.

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman please repeat the terms of the amendment?

Mr. HALE. "Which may be heard at a distance of one mile."

Mr. CONGER. Say "not less than one mile."

Mr. HALE. Let me state what I conceive to be a practical difficulty (which I know the gentleman from Texas would like to remedy as much as myself) in this provision, that the ordinary fog-horn shall be equal to a steam-whistle. Now, there are certain parties who have possession of what is called the Anderson & Van Trump fog-horn, and who are attempting to force that upon the small craft along our coast on the ground that it alone has as much power as the steam-whistle. Now I know that the gentleman does not want by this bill to play into the hands of any combination of that kind.

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; not at all.

Mr. HALE. To prevent that is my object in moving the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. Can the amendment be made to apply to vessels of some limit of burden or to sailing-vessels alone?

Mr. HALE. It applies to sailing-vessels only.

Mr. REAGAN. Then I shall not object.

Mr. CONGER. That is under the head "B." Is it confined to that?

Mr. HALE. When we come to the head "D" I propose to put it in there, too.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CRAPO. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Maine whether the test which he proposes is a practicable one? The distance at which a fog-horn or bell or whistle can be heard varies much with the conditions of the atmosphere. When the gentleman provides that the fog-horn shall be heard one mile, to what conditions of the atmosphere is that intended to apply?

Mr. HALE. Of course there are certain conditions under which no signal, no steam-whistle, can be heard half a mile; but under the law as we pass it, the Treasury Department will issue a regulation that shall adapt the requirement to the wants of the marine. We are changing the letter of the law; and then the Treasury Department will make a regulation that will be in accord with common-sense, providing how this distance of a mile shall be reckoned.

Mr. CRAPO. The difficulty in my mind——.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate on the amendment is exhausted.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. In the class of vessels under the heads "B" and "D," I have no objection to the gentleman's amendment, as it reduces the time of sounding the fog-horn from five minutes to two minutes, which would give more frequent indication of the approach of steamers or other vessels, and thus lessen the danger of collision. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. LYNDE. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I wish to call attention to the fact that we are now introducing a new rule in regard to the frequency with which these fog-horns shall be sounded, and are in this departing from the rule which has been adopted by all other commercial nations; so that a foreign vessel navigating our waters will be required to sound its fog-horn every two minutes, when, by the rule heretofore in force with us and now existing in all other commercial nations, the fog-horn is required to be sounded only once in every five minutes. This proposed change in one of the rules controlling the navigation of our vessels is of very considerable importance, involving great interests. I think we ought not to deviate from the rules adopted by other commercial nations in this respect. I wish it had been two minutes instead of five minutes as originally adopted. I think we are not justified in departing from rules adopted by other nations.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. The gentleman perhaps is not aware that this rule and other laws regarding the sounding of fog-horns is of recent adoption. It never was the rule in the United States until 1871.

Mr. LYNDE. It was in the British rules of navigation. Previously it was a rule adopted by the supervising inspectors.

Mr. CONGER. There was a rule in regard to sounding fog-horns adopted by supervising inspectors, but it never has been the law of the land until 1871. The rule has been in regard to sailing-vessels that they shall sound fog-horns at intervals of not more than five minutes. This act is to conform the rule in regard to sailing-vessels to two minutes, as in the case of other vessels. Now, I cannot see any harm in providing in the law for more frequent signals of danger upon the water.

Mr. LYNDE. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I wish to modify my amendment so it will read "which may be heard at a distance of one mile in still weather."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. REAGAN. There is no objection, but I wish to make an explanation in order to satisfy my friend from Wisconsin. If he will look at title D, of the law as it now is, of section 4233, under the heading "Fog-Signals," he will find it provides that coal-boats, trading-boats, produce-boats, canal-boats, oyster-boats, fishing-boats, rafts, or other water-craft, navigating any bay, harbor, or river by hand-power, horse-power, sail, or by the current of the river, or anchored or moored in or near the channel or fairway of any bay, harbor, or river, and not in any port, shall sound a fog-horn, or equivalent signal, which shall make a sound equal to a steam-whistle, at intervals of not more than two minutes. It will be seen, therefore, this bill is only extending the same rule to other vessels.

Mr. HALE's amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. LYNDE. I move to strike out lines 12 and 13 as they have been amended.

Mr. SAYLER. Is it in order for the gentleman to move to strike out what we have just agreed to insert?

Mr. LYNDE. The amendment of the gentleman from Maine was to this paragraph. I now move to strike out the paragraph as it has been amended, and I think I am in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the judgment of the Chair it is not too late for the gentleman from Wisconsin to move to strike out. He does not move to strike out the words that have been inserted on motion of the gentleman from Maine, but to strike out the paragraph as amended, which is in order.

Mr. LYNDE. We are here requiring foreign vessels navigating American waters to sound fog-horns every two minutes, when by the laws of their own countries and by the present law in this country they are required to sound fog-horns only every five minutes. The fact that we have a provision in the law at present requiring fishing-smacks, oyster-boats, and boats of that kind, when navigating bays, rivers, and narrow channels, to sound a fog-horn every two minutes, under the circumstances does not justify this change of the law in regard to foreign vessels or our own vessels on the high seas or upon our own large lakes. I think it will lead to confusion and to litigation, and consequently to damage and loss. Therefore I moved to strike out lines 12 and 13.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The gentleman from Wisconsin objects we should make the same law govern foreign vessels which we provide shall govern our own. I am told the rule of the road in Canada is to turn to the left, while in this country it is to turn to the right. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he would allow a Canadian to drive through his State or any portion of it and ignore the rule of the road in that State by following the rule which prevails in Canada. If in so doing, by taking the wrong direction, he should cause damage and loss, he would be held responsible under the law of that State to make the damage good. In my judgment the same rule should apply to foreign vessels navigating our waters that we apply to our own vessels.

Mr. SAYLER. It seems to me the objection urged by the gentleman from Wisconsin is not a very powerful one in this case. If we go to the foundation of his objection we could change nothing, and would be compelled to abide by the rules which have existed in the past. This is not such a change as is going to create the danger of making doubtful what the practice shall be; but, on the contrary, it is a change directly in the line of safety. We know nothing is so dangerous at sea, or on our rivers and lakes, as foggy weather, and the sounding of a fog-horn every two minutes only gives increased security. I do not see in any manner the objection made that we are changing the rules can be applicable to this section. I hope it will be passed, and that we will also pass this bill.

Mr. HALE. I have another amendment to the same rule which I desire to offer in rule 15, title D, after the word "which," in the next to the last line, strike out the words "shall make a sound equal to a steam-whistle" and insert in lieu thereof the words, "may be heard at a distance of one mile in still weather."

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to that. We have already adopted a similar amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] to strike out lines 12 and 13.

The motion to strike out was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That rule 17 of section 4233 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be stricken out and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

Rule 17. When two sail-vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the vessel with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the course of the vessel with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the vessel with the wind on the port side is close-hauled, and the other vessel free, in which case the latter vessel shall keep out of the course of the vessel close-hauled; but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the vessel which is to the windward shall keep out of the course of the vessel which is to the leeward.

Mr. LYNDE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas what is the object of striking out the word "way" wherever it occurs and inserting the word "course?"

Mr. REAGAN. The amendment in this rule is to substitute the word "course" for the word "way." By reference to rule 23 in the statutes it will be seen that a vessel which is given the right of way by rules 17, 19, 20, and 22 is required to keep her course subject to certain qualifications. If this were not so provided the safety of the vessel required to keep out of the way would be wholly at the mercy of the other vessel.

You will observe, Mr. Speaker, that the word "way" is a technical word, known to our sailors, as I understand. I do not profess technical knowledge of the subject, but the committee took a great deal of pains to get information from experts and seamen; and by some parties largely interested in commerce from New York, Milwaukee, and other places, we were advised that the United States courts in certain cases had held that the word "way" was to be taken in its broad sense, and not in its nautical sense of "course;" and, if so, the vessel which must keep out of the way of the other is subject to the mercy of the other.

For instance a vessel may sail across the course of another. The vessel required to keep out of the way sees her course and judges how she is to steer to keep out of the way of the other; but the first vessel may tack about and change her course, and then the vessel which has been doing her duty, steering according to the direction of the statute, must still keep out of the way. We are advised by experienced seamen that this places one class of vessels precisely at the mercy of the other. On that subject, perhaps the gentleman from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] could give the House further information. I am but speaking the voice of experienced seamen, who without dissent have appealed to us to protect the shipping interests of the country against the construction which the courts seem disposed to give to the word "way."

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

That in rule 20 of said section the word "way," in the last line of said rule, shall be stricken out and the word "course" inserted.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the paragraph just read.

Rule 20, which is sought to be amended, applies to the case of a steam-vessel and a sail-vessel. Now, as the law stands at present, it is made the duty of the steam-vessel to keep out of the way of the sail-vessel; that is, she shall keep away from her. The burden is upon the steam-vessel.

Now I ask the gentleman from Texas whether it would not be the case that any danger that is likely to occur between a steam-vessel and a sail-vessel will occur in our harbors in nine cases out of ten? There the sail-vessel has no free will and no great power over her movement and no course clearly or technically defined, and the steam-vessel has all the appliances that go with a vessel of that kind and can change her head at any moment. Now in the original bill this was recognized and it was declared, as I think properly, that the steam-vessel should keep out of the way of the sail-vessel.

Now, let me point out how this will operate if you change "way" to "course" here. A sailing-vessel in a harbor or roadstead is making the best she can of such wind as she has. It is a baffling wind; it is a wind that it is almost impossible to have a given course in. A steamer is coming up. If you oblige the sail-vessel to keep on her course, that is, the direction in which she is going at a given time, the steamer may run into her and may sink her, and if she has varied half a point from that, by reason of the peculiar wind or the lack of wind in the harbor, the owner of the little craft has not got a claim for a dollar's damages.

Does the gentleman from Texas want to put the little sail-vessel to that extremity? Does he want to give to the steamboat any additional defense to what she has now? It seems to me clear that for the protection of these small vessels the law should be as it is. I do not offer the amendment in the other sections, because they apply to steam-vessels and sailing-vessels in the cases where one meets the other. But as between the two, I tell the gentleman that by this amendment he is putting practically an additional burden on the little sailing-vessel and leaving her at the mercy of the steam-vessel. There would hardly ever be an instance of a suit brought by the owner or master of a little vessel run down that the steamboat-owner would not come in and claim that after a collision was imminent the sail-vessel had changed her course the least particle in the world, and that would be a defense.

I think the gentleman from Texas would not want to put that burden on the little sailing-vessels, and I therefore move to strike out lines 31, 32, and 33.

Mr. REAGAN. I call attention to rule 22, Mr. Speaker, as it is in the statute.

Mr. HALE. I had reference to rule 20.

Mr. REAGAN. But I want to call attention to rule 22, as qualifying that. Rule 22 qualifies and is to be construed in connection with this rule. It is:

Every vessel overtaking any other vessel shall keep out of the way of the last-mentioned vessel.

By the amendment in the bill it would be "out of the course," &c.

Mr. Speaker, the answer which I made to the inquiry of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] is the answer that I have to make to the objection made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] to this section. It is true that the power of handling a steamer perhaps is more effective and expeditious than the power of handling a sailing-vessel, but it is also true that no vessel, whether a steam or sailing-vessel, ought to be placed at the caprice of any other vessel.

The committee availed themselves on this subject of all the information they could get from experienced seamen. Instances were brought to our notice in different portions of the waters of the United States where from mere caprice sailing-vessels had put themselves in a position to cause the vessel to be sunk. One instance was mentioned in which a gentleman caused a steam-vessel to be piloted so as to run down an old vessel of his own that was insured.

If under the rule given here a vessel is required to keep out of the "course" of another, it is required to do so upon all the considerations understood by sailors There is nothing here intended to adopt an arbitrary rule that relieves any pilot or master of a vessel from considering anything which prudence and necessity require them to consider in order to avoid collisions. It is only intended by this bill—while it is not intended to relieve pilots and masters of vessels from their obligation to consider everything which prudence and duty require them to consider—it is only intended to provide by this change that no vessel, no class of vessels, shall be placed at the mercy of another or subjected to the caprice of another. The rules here are that a vessel shall be kept out of the course of another; that she shall consider the course of the vessel that she is approaching; that she shall consider the character and nature of the waters in which she is sailing, and if a sailing-vessel is going on a course necessarily requiring that vessel to tack about or change her course before the steamer can reach her, then the steam-vessel failing to recognize that necessity would be distinctly put at fault for running down the sailing-vessel and have to pay for the loss resulting from that action, as much so as she would be if she had run over the vessel intentionally in her course.

The committee confess that they have no special knowledge on this subject, but I will say to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] that upon this question we had before us experienced seamen from all parts of the country, who, in considering the sailing service and the laws on that subject and the construction which they had received by some of the courts, thought it necessary to make this change to prevent absolute injustice, or perhaps irreparable injustice. I repeat again that there is nothing in this amendment that means to absolve the officers of any vessel from considering anything which prudence and duty require them to consider in order to avoid collisions.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the last word, only to say that I did not make this point and I do not now as to the other rules previous to rule 20, for the reason that if both vessels are sailing-vessels then neither has the advantage in the power of changing her course; and, therefore, I do not object to the word "course" being inserted for "way." I do not object either if both vessels are steam-vessels, because they are on a par; but I repeat that if one is a sailing-vessel in a harbor with no fair wind and when it is almost impossible to fix a "course," I do not think that the gentleman in charge of this bill, in which there is so much that is good, or any gentleman who has had an interest in getting it up, can object to this discrimination where one is a steam and the other is a sailing vessel.

The case to which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has referred where by the caprice of a sailing-vessel damage resulted in a collision with a steamer must be an exceptional one. The presumption is that the smaller vessel does not want a collision any more than the larger vessel. There are one or two men on a sailing-craft; they do not want to be run down at the risk of being drowned, and their property destroyed and having a lawsuit on their hands any more than a steamboat that carries thirty, forty, or one hundred persons. The law of self-preservation will operate as to vessels, and therefore when a steamboat does its best, the best of the steamboat is a great deal better than the best that a sailing-vessel can do.

Mr. BURLEIGH. I rise to oppose the motion of my colleague. This law should be so framed as to protect both sailing-vessels and steamers, and I can see very serious objections to having the word "way" in room of the word "course."

To illustrate, there is hardly a gentleman here who has not traveled on the road and found some one driving along at an easy jog and he would like to pass him, but out of some caprice the person in front of him heads him off; he has either to stop or try to pass on the other side of the way. Now, suppose a sailing-vessel and a steamer are going up a river; the sailing-vessel has got a good fair wind and goes nearly as fast as the steamer; she does not want the steamer to pass her, and when the steamer tries to pass her she heads her off, and the steamer has either to go ashore or to back out and try to pass on the other side. That is the effect of substituting "way" for "course." The steamer's course is regularly up the river, but if the steamer has got to keep out of the "way" of the sailing-vessel which may be up the river, the sailing-vessel can go to one side or the other and head the steamer off, and the steamer has to keep out of the way all the time.

Mr. HALE. I would like to ask my colleague [Mr. BURLEIGH] a question.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Does he not think that the law as it now is, which provides that the steam-vessel shall "keep out of the way" of the sailing-vessel, is more favorable to the sailing-vessel than this proposed change would be?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I think it is; but as I said in the beginning of my remarks, the law should be made for the protection of the steam as well as of the sailing vessel.

Mr. HALE. But the gentleman thinks—and he has had large experience—that the sailing-vessel does not need more protection than she now has under the law?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I do not admit that.

Mr. HALE. Does he not think that the sailing-vessel needs all the protection she now has under the law?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I do not know exactly what the law is. But I say there should be vastly more protection afforded to the sailing-vessel than to the steamer. There should be no law, however, that would protect the sailing-vessel when needlessly obstructing the passage of a steamer, any more than there should be such a law in the case of carriages on the public highway.

Mr. HALE. If the word "way" is struck out of the law and the word "course" substituted for it, will the sailing-vessel have sufficient protection? I ask the gentleman because he has been a practical ship-master.

Mr. BURLEIGH. The distinction between "course" and "way" is very fine; and when I first looked over this bill I could hardly see the distinction. The "way" of a sailing-vessel is the direction she must go by the wind. If she has no "way" then she is at anchor or becalmed. This rule says, "If two vessels, one of which is a sail-vessel and the other a steam-vessel, are proceeding," &c. That of course means that both are in motion, that both are under steerage way.

Mr. HALE. Does not my colleague think that if a steamboat is obliged to keep out of the "way" of a sailing-vessel, there is more required of the steamboat than to keep out of the "course" of the sail-vessel?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I think so.

Mr. HALE. And if you change "way" into "course," will not the sail-vessel have protection enough?

Mr. BURLEIGH. It will.

Mr. HALE. My colleague ought to know better than I do, because he has been a practical ship-master.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. HALE to strike out the paragraph relating to rule 20; and it was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 28, noes not counted.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

That rule 23 of the same section shall be stricken out, and the following inserted in lieu thereof:

Rule 23. Where, by rules 17, 19, 20, and 22, one vessel is required to keep out of the course of another, the other vessel shall keep her course, unless it is impossible to do so without incurring immediate danger.

That rule 24 of the same section shall be stricken out.

Mr. HALE. I move to strike out the clause which reads as follows:

That rule 24 of the same section shall be stricken out.

In order that gentlemen may understand what rule 24 is, which is sought to be struck out, I will read it. It is a rule for the guidance of courts in questions arising under this law. It is:

In construing and obeying these rules due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from them necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

When the steamboat bill was originally passed that rule, which allowed the courts flexibility and the opportunity of considering the equities of each case and the necessities that influenced the masters of vessels in departing from the strict rules, was inserted in the bill, and it was one of the reasons why the bill was made acceptable. It was deemed proper that the courts should have that power; that these rules, which we in our fallible wisdom framed here, should not be so stern and pitiless as to hold every vessel in their jaws without relief. The courts were therefore given certain discretionary powers in the cases that might arise under the law. It may be said, and perhaps will be said, that this point is reached by the provision at the end of rule 23, as proposed to be amended by this bill; that provision is, "unless it is impossible to do so without incurring immediate danger." But that clause is by no means so humane and general as the rule which this bill proposes to strike out.

All the benefit which will be obtained from the provision which I have just read, and which this bill proposes shall be inserted at the end of rule 23 as a substitute for rule 24, is where it was impossible for the vessel to have done differently without incurring danger; throwing the burden of proof upon the vessel itself, which may perhaps have deviated a little from the law, to show that it was not possible to have done otherwise without incurring immediate danger. Rule 24, which I have read, it seems to me, gives not more than a fair discretion to the courts in construing a law which is so severe as this, imposing such penalties, confining men down to minutes and almost to seconds. "Due regard must be had to all dangers of navigation and to any special circumstances which may exist in any particular case rendering a departure from them (these rules) necessary in order to avoid immediate danger."

I do not believe the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER,] who I see has risen to his feet, would on reflection object to this rule 24 being retained. I do not seek any change in the law in this respect, but merely to retain this humane rule.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] seems to have anticipated very readily the purpose for which I rise; that is, to suggest that the latter portion of the proposed amended rule 23, which he has just read, be stricken out; that is, "unless it is impossible to do so without incurring immediate danger." I would suggest that he include that in addition to the motion he has made to strike out the clause repealing rule 24. On reflection I think there is some propriety in retaining rule 24, which has frequently been construed by the courts.

Mr. REAGAN. On the first consideration of this portion of this bill, the impression made upon my mind was the same as that made upon the minds of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SAYLER.] But I had not sufficient faith in my individual judgment to place it in conflict with that of men whose lives had been devoted to this particular pursuit and the consideration of questions growing out of that pursuit. It was suggested that with rules 17 and 23, as they are here, rule 24 becomes superfluous. Let us see what these rules are. Rule 17 is as follows:

When two sail-vessels are crossing, so as to involve risk of collision, then, if they have the wind on different sides, the vessel with the wind on the port side shall keep out of the course of the vessel with the wind on the starboard side, except in the case in which the vessel with the wind on the port side is close-hauled, and the other vessel free, in which case the latter vessel shall keep out of the course of the vessel close-hauled; but if they have the wind on the same side, or if one of them has the wind aft, the vessel which is to the windward shall keep out of the course of the vessel which is to the leeward.

That gives particular directions what shall be done in particular contingencies, indicating the law and the duty of the parties under it. Rule 23 provides—

Where, by rules 17, 19, 20, and 22, one vessel is required to keep out of the course of another, the other vessel shall keep her course, unless it is impossible to do so without incurring immediate danger.

For instance, if a vessel is sailing in a given course and another is approaching, the one required to keep her course considers the course of the other vessel in order to avoid collision; but she is only required to keep her course when that can be done without incurring immediate danger. If it is impossible for the vessel to keep her course without incurring immediate danger, then under the law she has a right to change her course. The object sought in reference to the course of the respective vessels is to avoid collision. Now, under the rules which I have read are there any other contingencies in the navigation of vessels that need to be provided for? It was insisted by the experienced men who were before us that these rules contained all that was necessary; that the twenty-fourth rule would be superfluous. My own feeling was, as expressed by the gentleman from Maine, that rule 24 let in the larger equities; but it was insisted that that rule was not necessary.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to offer the following as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine:

Strike out all after the word "course" and insert "subject to the qualifications of rule 24."

Strike out lines 44 and 45.

I will state that this amendment leaves rules 23 and 24 just as they are now with the exception that the phraseology is changed by substituting "course" for "way."

Mr. HALE. I accept that as a substitute for my amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I cannot agree with the committee in their recommendation to strike out rule 24. There are twenty-three rules relating to lights, steerage, course-signals, fog-horns, and various other subjects. Rule 24 has a general application to all these rules. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] strikes out of rule 24 what relates to only two or three of the rules. Now, rule 24 is in the exact language of one of the early decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in regard to the rules then in force. It is an adjudicated matter. It is a decision now well understood and recognized, which may perhaps continue in force for all time, and which must be applied to the execution of these twenty-three rules, whether you have rule 24 or not. No court would dare to construe these rules so strictly that any surrounding circumstances could not be taken into consideration by the court or jury. Therefore, in order that all might understand what the court will rule and what the law should be, rule 24 was incorporated as the concluding rule of the whole series. I think that rule 24 had better continue in force. I believe it is useful, conveying information to all concerned and giving full authority of law to the courts when they make their decisions. I think the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio need not be made, for in that particular connection the exception is very well.

Mr. SAYLER. The gentleman certainly misunderstands the purport of my amendment. I do not propose to affect rule 24 at all; I propose to let it stand just as it is now on the statute-book; and the only change made in rule 23 is the substitution of the word "course" for the word "way" in a single instance. Otherwise the amendment leaves the matter just as it is now, as the gentleman is advocating.

Mr. CONGER. I thought the gentleman proposed to strike out rule 24.

Mr. SAYLER. I propose to strike out the two lines that repeal rule 24. I agree with the gentleman. He has made a speech on my side without knowing it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman is welcome to it, if it is any better than he could make himself.

Mr. SAYLER. I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. REAGAN. I have already explained the reasons for the action of the committee and stated some of the objections that had occurred to my mind in regard to the amendment. I have no power to accept it, but I do not antagonize it.

Mr. LYNDE. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] by striking out "course" and inserting "way."

Mr. Speaker, I do not understand what the gentlemen of the committee mean by saying "keep out of the course of a vessel." I do understand what is meant by keeping out of the way of a vessel. A vessel takes its course, say south-southeast, and another vessel approaches it or comes toward it from another point of the compass, then what do they mean by saying this vessel approaching must keep out of her course? Their courses cross each other. They must pass each other. Then the rule is the vessel must keep out of the way; she must avoid the other vessel. She does not propose to get into her course; she does not propose to take the same course, but she continues on her original course and takes no other. What does this language mean, by keeping out of her course? I confess I do not understand it. Gentlemen who have had some experience in that matter can inform us. I withdraw my amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That section 4234 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be so amended as to read as follows:

SEC. 4234. Collectors, or other chief officers of the customs, shall require all sail-vessels to be furnished with proper signal-lights; and every such vessel shall, on the approach of any steam-vessel during the night-time, show a lighted torch upon that point or quarter to which such steam-vessel shall be approaching. Every such vessel that shall be navigated without complying with the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be liable to a penalty of $200, one-half to go to the informer, and for all damages caused thereby; and the vessel so navigated may be seized and proceeded against by way of libel in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense; and the officer or officers in charge of the deck of any such vessel who shall fail or refuse to exhibit such light shall be liable to a penalty of $100, and for all damages caused by such neglect or refusal, and may be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year.

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, I believe this section has the last objection I shall raise to the bill; but it is a very serious one. After having cut down the time in which signals shall be given and added to the care that must be bestowed by mariners, this section, in addition to the penalties, which are severe—to the extent of $200 for every infraction, as found in lines 10 and 11—provides, in addition to the law we have been living under for the last three years, in addition to the penalty of $200 for every infraction of this law, that the vessel shall be liable for all damages caused thereby, and on the next page additional imprisonment is provided for.

I move to strike out in lines 12 and 13 these words: "one-half to go to the informer, and for all damages caused thereby." Part of that is in the present law. I do not think it ought to be. I do not think in a matter of this kind that the informer, the man who lies in wait to catch his neighbor in a trap, should be encouraged. I do not believe in any of the laws of the United States there should be anything encouraging the informer, the man who makes it his business to spy out his neighbor's fault. Take this bill. Here is a little vessel upon one of our northern or southern rivers or upon one of our western rivers. She lies in a fog and is obliged to sound her bell every two minutes. There is no steamer within a hundred miles of her; she lies within ten feet of shore. Some sneak, some wretch who wants to make money out of his neighbor's infirmity, comes down to the shore to watch, and if he finds the bell is not rung every one hundred and twenty seconds, he informs upon his neighbor, and the owner of that little craft is compelled to pay $200, of which the informer pockets $100.

I say the needs of navigation—that the parties who need to be protected on vessels likely to be run into are sufficient of themselves to see this law is in force. I do not want anything put into the hands of the informer. He is not a man my friend from Texas should encourage or this House should encourage, and the proper efficiency of the bill will in no degree be impaired by striking out the words "one-half to go to the informer, and for all damages caused thereby."

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, the necessity for change of our navigation laws has been urged upon Congress for some years past. Changes were urged during the last Congress and during the preceding Congress. These changes grow out of our commerce, out of the necessity for giving security to vessels, security to the property upon them, security to the lives of the crews, and security to the lives of the passengers.

When we consider, sir—and I call the attention of the House to it, for this is one of the most important of all the sections of the bill, and changes of it must affect in the largest degree of all the changes made in the bill, the commercial interests of this country—when we consider the hundreds of millions of money invested in vessels navigating the inland waters, the lakes, and the ocean, and the commerce afloat on them; when we estimate the hundreds of thousands of lives of crews of vessels and passengers whose safety depends upon the safety of the vessels; when we remember the perils of the ocean, unknown upon land, it seems to me that a wise Legislature will take the precautionary steps necessary to give security to these great interests. Do we mean to do that, or do we mean to take the marrow out of the law, and deliver the vessels, their owners, and the commerce they float, and the people who are on them as crews and passengers over to the mercies of the reckless and the avaricious? Do you mean to do this? If you do not, I warn you you had better retain the section as it is.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman think that it is necessary to encourage the informer in order to do that?

Mr. REAGAN. I will answer that as I go along.

Mr. Speaker, on that particular subject—I depart for a moment from the line of argument I was making—I have this to say: that the few persons who are on board a vessel that may know whether there has been a compliance with the requirements of the law may be under a sort of moral duress to the officers of the vessel; they may be unwilling voluntarily to give information; vessels may be wrecked, lives may be lost, fortunes sunk; and if there is not some means provided to induce those who know the cause to reveal the information which will lead to the punishment of the wrong-doers, we have failed, it seems to me, to do our duty in the making of the law.

The section as proposed to be amended contains the words "and for all damages caused thereby." The law as it was heretofore gave a penalty of $200. For what? Let me read the preceding part of the section:

Collectors, or other chief officers of the customs, shall require all sail-vessels to be furnished with proper signal-lights; and every such vessel shall, on the approach of any steam-vessel during the night-time—

"The approach of any steam-vessel during the night-time." A most dangerous time—show a lighted torch upon that point or quarter to which such steam-vessel shall be approaching. Every such vessel that shall be navigated without complying with the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be liable to a penalty of $200.

This and the preceding rules are intended to give the security, which experience has indicated was demanded, to the commerce, the property, and the lives of the people of this country. Is it too much, sir, to say that that officer of a vessel or those officers of a vessel who cause the destruction of property, who cause the sacrifice of lives, shall be, in addition to a $200 penalty, exposed to the necessity of paying the damages caused by their disregard of the law and their reckless disregard of the rights and the lives of others? Is this too much?

The latter clause of the section was added to this because the penalty so far is a penalty upon the vessel. There was in the law as it now exists no penalty upon the officer himself, and therefore the committee added these words:

And the officer or officers in charge of the deck of any such vessel who shall fail or refuse to exhibit such light shall be liable to a penalty of $100, and for all damages caused by such neglect or refusal, and may be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. REAGAN. To enable me to finish my remarks, I move to strike out the last word.

This last clause was added to the existing rule and fixes a penalty upon the officers who are the wrong-doers, whose neglect or willful fault may have caused the injury. As the law is without this clause added to it, not only the owners of the vessel by whose fault the wrong is done may themselves be free from fault, but all the officers except those whose duty it is to present the lights may be free from fault; a vessel may be sunk, her cargo and her crew and her passengers sent to the bottom of the ocean, and yet under the law as it now stands you cannot impose a penalty upon the very men, the very officers in charge of the deck whose duty it is to present the light. They may be the only wrong-doers, and yet under the law as it now stands you cannot punish them. The object of the committee was, in addition to making the vessel liable for $200 penalty, to authorize the courts to visit a penalty of $100 on the wrong-doer who should willfully or negligently fail to perform his duty and to authorize the courts to imprison him for a term not exceeding one year.

Mr. CONGER. I think the House should pause a moment before it changes the law of vessel liability. We have in our statute-books a law regulating the liability of vessels. It has been in force a long time. It is well understood. The extent of the liability of a vessel for damage to another vessel is the value of the vessel and her pending freight. Now, by a simple insertion of a few words in a bill for the protection and security of life, the entire legal liability of vessels is changed. I had not observed it heretofore, but I call the attention of the committee to the fact that in lines 12 and 13, following these words—

Every such vessel that shall be navigated without complying with the provisions of this and the preceding section shall be liable to a penalty of $200—these words being in the present law, there is added this:

and for all damages caused thereby.

The vessel shall be liable, the owners shall be liable, for all damages caused by the neglect to obey these rules. Now, the legal liability of a vessel under such circumstances the world over, among all maritime nations, as in England and the United States, is that the owners of the vessel, or the vessel, as it is called, shall be liable to the extent of the value of the vessel and the pending freight. Why, then, should there be inserted here in remedial legislation intended to preserve life and property on the water—and that is the object of all this class of legislation—why should there be in this manner, by the insertion of six words, an absolute change of the law in this same statute-book which fixes the liability of vessels and of all vessels, with only the consideration that we can give it in this particular bill?

Now, the laws of 1851 and 1854 and the amendments since that time have remained as the law of the land in regard to all vessels navigating all the waters of the United States. I think that this amendment has no place here. It is no penalty. It is not a provision which at all guarantees more safety to life and property than if it were stricken out, and I speak of it now because I have given to the gentleman from Texas a general assent to the amendments proposed by this bill; but differing on this point so widely from the committee, I must oppose this amendment and also the insertion in lines 18, 19, 20 of the words by which the man whose duty it is to hang the light, and who may not even have been commanded to hang it by the officer, shall himself be liable for all the damages caused by collision, damages amounting to thousands and thousands of dollars, and shall also be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year.

These are new matters inserted in the law. I cannot think that it is for the interest of navigation that this shall be inserted here, and especially only in regard to sailing-vessels. A law fixing damages in case of collision, a law which shall regulate the entire liability of all vessels in the United States, should not be parceled out in this particular bill, changing the liability of sailing-vessels and leaving all other vessels under the old law. It is not wise. In all legislation on this subject the law should be uniform, and should apply to all crafts sailing on the waters alike and under like circumstances. Therefore I agree with the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] not in his proposition to strike out that part of the amendment relating to the informer, but only in striking out the last three lines, "for all damages caused by such neglect or refusal, and may be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year."

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my motion to strike out the last word and renew it. I am satisfied, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has misapprehended the entire object of this section.

He seems to suppose that the office of this section or the part that he objects to is to fix the measure of the liability of vessels and of vessel-owners. That is no part either of the object or effect of the section as it stands; but if he will turn to pages 24, 25, and 26 of the bill, section 31, he will find there a section that fixes fully and clearly the idea of the committee of the nature and extent of the liability of vessel-owners.

Mr. CONGER. That is in relation to passengers.

Mr. REAGAN. The words the gentleman objects to in this section relate to derelict vessels, vessels by whose fault collisions and loss of a vessel and property and life is incurred, and provides that they shall not be let off by paying a penalty of $200. To sink a vessel worth $100,000, to sink a cargo with her worth $100,000, to sink one thousand precious lives into a watery grave is worth more than $200, I submit to the gentleman from Michigan and the gentleman from Maine.

Mr. HALE. That is the law now; the gentleman need not interfere with the present law.

Mr. REAGAN. The liability under the law now is $200, and we propose to add to that that they shall be liable for the damages caused in addition to the $200 penalty. Is that unreasonable?

Mr. HALE. Does not the gentleman admit that under the present law if a vessel colliding with another be at fault she may be libeled herself and holden for the whole damage done?

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman is discussing this section of the bill and the effect of this section. I am not going to be drawn away from the consideration of that section to discuss something that does not belong to it; I am discusssing the question of the contingencies which depend upon our preserving or changing the section as reported. We propose to provide that those whose property is sacrificed shall not be compelled to content themselves with imposing a fine of $200, but shall be authorized to hold the vessel liable for the damage caused by her fault. Who says that that is not equitable, just, and honest? Who wishes to protect the wrong-doer in sacrificing many lives and hundreds of thousands of dollars' worth of property?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE. I rise to oppose the amendment to the amendment. I will say nothing now as to the last part of this section, which has been referred to by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.] I will call attention again to my amendment with reference to informers. In the last Congress whenever the question came up of striking out provisions for the encouragement of informers in respect to the infraction of the internal-revenue or any other law of the United States, Congress put itself on record against the informer. If this Congress sees fit to go back upon the record we must submit.

On the question of damages in the case of collision, which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] says should not be limited to the fine of $200, I agree with him. But if the gentleman has ever practiced in the admiralty courts he knows that in case of a collision a libel may be brought against the vessel at fault, and the whole of that vessel is holden for the damage, whether it be $200 or $2,000, or whatever it may be; in a suit in rem the vessel herself is holden in response to the judgment, and may be sold to answer it.

Mr. REAGAN. I know that is the case in a civil action, but it is not a criminal offense.

Mr. HALE. No; and that is the very reason it should not be a criminal offense to the extent of encouraging the informer. When a steamer or sailing-vessel has wrongfully been run into by another and damaged to the extent of five or ten thousand dollars, the vessel in fault must pay that damage, and the civil courts are liberal toward the party injured. But when my friend seeks to add increased penalties to encourage the spy and the informer to make suits, he goes further than is required by any right legislation.

Mr. REAGAN. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HALE. I now ask a vote on my amendment to strike out the words in lines 12 and 13, "one-half to go to the informer, and for all damages caused thereby."

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the gentleman to consent to a division of his amendment, so that the question may be first taken on striking out the portion relating to the informer and then upon the part relating to damages.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to that.

The question was then taken on striking out the words "one-half to go to the informer;" and it was agreed to.

The question was then taken on striking out the words "and all damages caused thereby;" and upon a division there were—ayes 39, noes 26.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for tellers on that amendment. I think it is very important.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum having voted the Chair will order tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. REAGAN and Mr. HALE were appointed.

Mr. HALE. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for tellers.

Mr. REAGAN. It is suggested to me that if I insist upon a further count the House may find itself without a quorum; I will therefore withdraw the call for tellers.

No further count being called for, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER. As the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] has been adopted, I would suggest that the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] in the last part of this section be also adopted.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend, near the close of the section, by striking out the words "and for all damages caused by such neglect or refusal."

Mr. HALE. Include the striking out of these words, "and may be imprisoned for any time not exceeding one year."

Mr. CONGER. I would rather not; I have no objection to the imprisonment; I think there should be that punishment.

Mr. REAGAN. As the other amendment has been agreed to, I will make no objection to this, although I have no authority to accept it.

The amendment of Mr. CONGER was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read the following:

SEC. 8. That section 4413 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be so amended as to read as follows:

SEC. 4413. Every pilot, engineer, mate, or master of any steam-vessel, who neglects or willfully refuses to observe the regulations established in pursuance of the preceding section, shall be liable to a suspension or revocation of his license, and to a penalty of $50, and for all damages sustained by such neglect or refusal, and may be imprisoned not exceeding two years.

Mr. ODELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope not.

Mr. SAYLER. I trust we will not adjourn now.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to, upon a division—ayes 31, noes 52.

Mr. ODELL. I believe no quorum voted on the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It does not require a quorum to decide the motion to adjourn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. That section 4418 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be so amended as to read as follows:

SEC. 4418. The local inspectors shall also inspect the boilers of all steam-vessels before the same shall be used, and once at least in every year thereafter. They shall subject all boilers to the hydrostatic pressure, and shall satisfy themselves by thorough examination that the boilers are well made, of good and suitable material; that the openings for the passage of water and steam, respectively, and all pipes and tubes exposed to heat, are of proper dimensions and free from obstruction; that the spaces between and around the flues are sufficient; that the flues are circular in form; that the fire-line of the furnace is at least two inches below the prescribed minimum water-line of the boilers; that the arrangement for delivering the feed-water is such that the boilers cannot be injured thereby; and that such boilers and machinery and the appurtenances may be safely employed in the service proposed in the written application, without peril to life. They shall also satisfy themselves that the safety-valves are of suitable dimensions, sufficient in number, and well arranged, and that the weights of the safety-valves are properly adjusted, so as to allow no greater pressure in the boilers than the amount prescribed by the inspection certificate; that there is a sufficient number of gauge-cocks properly inserted, and, to indicate the pressure of steam, reliable and approved steam-gauges, one of which is to be placed in each fire-room and one in the engine-room, and which shall at all times be free to the inspection of passengers; and that there are reliable low-water gauges and a suitable steam-whistle; and that, when required by the inspectors, the fusible metals are properly inserted so as to fuse by the heat of the furnace whenever the water in the boilers falls below its prescribed limits; and that adequate and certain provision is made for an ample supply of water to feed the boilers at all times, whether such vessel is in motion or not, so that in high-pressure boilers the water shall not be less than four inches above the top of the flues; and that means for blowing out are provided, so as to, so far as practicable, thoroughly remove the mud and sediment from all parts of the boilers when they are under the pressure of steam. In subjecting to the hydrostatic tests boilers usually designated and known as high-pressure boilers, the inspectors shall assume one hundred and ten pounds to the square inch as the maximum pressure allowable as a working-power for a new boiler of forty-two inches in diameter, made in the best manner, of inspected iron plates one-fourth of an inch thick and of a quality required by law, and shall rate the working-power of all high-pressure boilers, whether old or new, according to their strength compared with this standard; and in all cases the test applied shall exceed the working-power allowed in the ratio of one hundred and sixty-five to one hundred and ten. In subjecting to the hydrostatic tests boilers usually designated and known as low-pressure boilers, the inspectors shall allow as a working-power for each new boiler a pressure of only three-fourths the number of pounds to the square inch to which it has been subjected by the hydrostatic test, and for which it has been found to be sufficient. Should the inspectors be of the opinion that any boiler, by reason of its construction or material, will not safely allow so high a working-pressure as is above described, they may, for reasons to be stated specially in their certificate, fix the working-pressure of such boiler at less than three-fourths of the test-pressure. All boilers used on steam-vessels, and constructed of iron or steel plates inspected under the provisions of section 4430, shall be subjected to a hydrostatic test in the ratio of one hundred and fifty pounds to the square inch to one hundred pounds to the square inch of the working steam-power allowed. No boiler or pipe, nor any of the connections therewith, shall be approved which is made, in whole or in part, of bad material, or is unsafe in its form or dangerous from defective workmanship, age, use, or other cause.

Mr. STONE. I move to amend the section just read, in line 25, after the words "gauge-cocks properly inserted," by inserting the words, "and the lowest gauge-cock shall not be inserted less than four inches above the top of the flues."

Mr. REAGAN. The language of the section as it now reads is as follows:

That there is a sufficient number of gauge-cocks properly inserted, and, to indicate the pressure of steam, reliable and approved steam-gauges, one of which is to be placed in each fire-room and one in the engine-room, and which shall at all times be free to the inspection of passengers.

In regard to this as well as many other sections of this bill I have no professional or technical knowledge. I will say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. STONE] that while we were at work on this bill the board of supervising inspectors were in session in this city, and we were advised by them. We were also advised by the officers and members of the national board of navigation. We had information from every source that we could make available upon this as well as upon the other sections of the bill. We have prepared and presented this bill as those who by professional duties and technical knowledge were entitled to consideration indicated that it should be presented. From any knowledge which I possess I am not able to say whether the amendment of the gentleman is right or wrong. But I wish to say to the House that this bill is in accordance with the recommendations of men whose professional duties and technical knowledge we relied upon.

Mr. STONE. The clause to which my amendment applies provides for "a sufficient number of gauge-cocks properly inserted, and, to indicate the pressure of steam, reliable and approved steam-gauges." The gentleman from Texas has certainly no practical knowledge on these subjects if he is aware that the gauge-cock is one instrument, designed to indicate the amount of water in the boiler, while the steam-gauge is a distinct instrument, for the purpose of indicating the pressure of steam in the boiler. Now, if gentlemen will look at lines 33, 37, and 38 of the bill they will find it provided that—

In high-pressure boilers the water shall not be less than four inches above the top of the flues.

I offer this amendment as one who, during the last twenty-five years, has had some practical knowledge of the construction and operation of high-pressure steam-boilers, and who has seen the disastrous results of reckless engineering.

Mr. BRADLEY. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "two inches" instead of "four inches." The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] has moved to fix four "inches" as the lowest point above the flue at which a gauge-cock should be inserted. I wish to ask him whether he does not believe that that is too high from the top of the flue for the lowest gauge-cock? Further on in the bill, in lines 36 and 37, to which the gentleman has referred, it is provided that the water shall not be permitted to go to a point lower than four inches above the flue. Now, while it may be the intention of the law to prevent adding more fuel to the fire and continuing on in the ordinary manner when the water shall go down to a point four inches above the flue, yet I submit to all practical men that in spite of the provision of the law the water may be actually permitted to go lower; and it is a matter of the utmost importance that the engineer should know how low the water has gone. While I agree with the gentleman that four inches above the flue is a point below which ordinarily the water should not be allowed to go, yet if it actually does go below that point, it is important that the engineer should know how much lower it has gone. Hence the necessity for one gauge-cock inserted at a point below that which is intended as the lowest point to which the water shall ever go. The insertion of these gauge-cocks is for the purpose of informing the engineer how low the water has actually fallen, so that when it is too low the proper remedies may be applied.

Mr. STONE. In answer to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. BRADLEY,] I will say that when the water gets to within four inches of the top of the flue, the engineer should at once take steps to provide more water. The argument of the gentleman would be equally good in favor of a gauge-cock only one inch above the flue. We have had some experience with high-pressure boilers on our western rivers, and we know the importance of having plenty of water above the flue, for if a steamboat strikes one of the sand-bars which obstruct our rivers the flue is often exposed, so that there is greater liability of collapse or explosion than where obstructions to the navigation do not exist. I therefore insist upon my amendment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. The existing law provides, and this bill does not propose to change the law in this respect, that there shall be a sufficient number of gauge-cocks properly inserted, the object being to test the quantity of water in the boiler. I cannot see any necessity for a change of the law in this respect. What difference can it make if there is a line of gauge-cocks set from the top of the boiler clear down to the flue?

Mr. STONE. I will answer the gentleman. The difference is that the engineer will carry the water at the lowest gauge-cock.

Mr. CONGER. The law requires the engineer to keep the water at least four inches above the flue. It also requires the board of inspectors to decide, on examination, whether a sufficient number of gauge-cocks have been inserted in the boiler and whether they are properly placed. I think that we should not limit the discretion allowed by the existing law to the board of inspectors, who make rules for the government of vessels engaged in the various kinds of navigation.

Again, every one knows when water foams in the boiler it is impossible to tell within two or three inches where the true water-line is. A gauge-cock two inches above the flue will answer whether the water is foaming or not. There can be no harm in allowing a gauge-cock to be inserted at that point, if in the discretion of the inspectors it be thought necessary. It seems to me unwise to fix a limit of four inches. Let us not interfere with the discretion of the board to make such rules as shall be suggested by their knowledge and judgment on these subjects.

Mr. STONE. If the gentleman will look at sections 36, 37, and 38 of the bill he will observe it is provided that in high-pressure boilers the water shall not be less than four inches above the top of the flue.

Mr. CONGER. I have just read that.

Mr. STONE. Though it be required that the engineer shall carry water at four inches, he may carry it at two inches. He has a gauge-cock at two inches, and he may carry it down to two inches.

Mr. CONGER. It is provided it shall be four inches above the flue, whether any gauge-cock is in or not. There is a penalty imposed upon every engineer who violates that strongest and best provision of the law, that the flue shall be covered with water at least four inches above the flue.

Mr. STONE. But who is to inspect the engineer after the boat is under way if he shall carry it down to two inches? and that engineers do so I know from sad experience.

Mr. CONGER. Who is to report any infraction of law on the part of the engineer? This will be provided for as in other cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is exhausted.

Mr. BRADLEY'S amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. STONE'S amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 60, noes 32; no quorum voting.

Mr. ODELL. Is there a quorum present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum does not appear by the last vote.

Mr. ODELL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. STONE and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 13, noes 41.

Mr. STONE. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ODELL. I move the House adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 38, noes 63.

Mr. ODELL. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. ODELL and Mr. REAGAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 39, noes 64.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the Chair makes the announcement of the vote, I desire to ask the attention of the House for a moment. This is an important bill. It has been pressed upon Congress and upon the Committee on Commerce as a measure of the utmost necessity. If we stay here we can probably get through with it in a short time. If we do not pass it this evening, I am afraid it will be the last time we will have a chance to consider it.

Mr. SAYLER. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is not necessary a quorum should be present to vote on a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been demanded.

Mr. REAGAN. Now, in order to guard against all contingencies, I ask consent, if we do not get through with the bill to-day, it shall be made the special order for Wednesday next after the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. Not to interfere with the legislative appropriation bill. For one I am willing to go on with the bill now. I hope the House will go on with it this evening and get it out of the way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the proposition of the gentleman from Texas. In view of the bill not being completed to-day, is there objection to its being made the special order for Wednesday next at two o'clock, not to interfere with the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. RANDALL. I object.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Is there a quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman make the point?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I do.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No quorum appeared on the last vote. No quorum being present, there are only two motions in order, a motion to adjourn and a motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. SAYLER. How is the Chair informed that a quorum is not present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is officially informed by the report of the tellers on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri that no quorum is present.

Mr. SAYLER. We do not need a quorum on a motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn has been decided in the negative, and the question recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE,] on which a quorum did not appear on a division of the House by tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky to name next Saturday for the further consideration of this bill as the special order.

Mr. REAGAN. I am willing to adopt that suggestion.

Mr. O'NEILL. O, no; let us go on with the bill now.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We want an hour to rest, and I thing we are entitled to it.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask if we cannot now proceed with the consideration of the bill?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object. There is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has stated that it is the judgment of the present occupant of the chair that, it having been officially ascertained that there is no quorum present, the only motion in order is a motion to adjourn or a motion for a call of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I would suggest that the tellers take their places again that it may be ascertained if there be a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the tellers last on the floor will resume their places.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object. That would be a proceeding without precedent.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that the House adjourn, for the purpose of having a vote by tellers to ascertain if there be a quorum present.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object, because no business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Tuesday next. I make that as a formal motion for the purpose of testing by tellers whether there is a quorum present, and to save the time that would be occupied in calling the roll.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point against that motion that it is not in order; there being but two motions now in order, the motion to adjourn, and the motion for a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. I but repeated the words of the Chair a moment before. I thought the Chair was wrong.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is very glad to know that in order to maintain his own position it is not necessary to sustain a false point of order made by the gentleman from Michigan. The Chair decides that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order.

Mr. RANDALL. On that motion I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. RANDALL and Mr. STONE were appointed.

Mr. COX. Will the Speaker allow me to address an interrogatory to the Chair? What was the pending question on the bill before this disturbance began?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question was on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE.]

Mr. COX. Why can we not vote on that by unanimous consent to ascertain if there be a quorum here?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The tellers will take their places.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 93; no quorum voting.

Mr. SAYLER. I hope there will be no objection now, as it is evident we are compelled to adjourn, to fix the consideration of this bill for next Saturday immediately after the reading of the Journal. It is a bill of great importance, and ought to be considered by the House.

Mr. PIPER. I object to the bill being assigned to next Saturday.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. SAYLER. I hope the House will not adjourn until a day is fixed for resuming the consideration of the bill.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. HAYMOND, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD some remarks which he had prepared on the question of the resumption of specie payments. [See Appendix.]

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has become notoriously public about the city of Washington——

Mr. REAGAN. I object to the consideration of the pending bill being set aside for the purpose of going on with other business.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I call for the regular order, which is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I make the point of order that the objection of the gentleman from Texas comes too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order of the gentleman from New York is overruled. The resolution had not been fully reported by the Clerk when objection was made, and is not before the House.

Before submitting the question on the motion to adjourn, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain communications which he finds on the Speaker's table. He desires to submit a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of a telegram from the Lieutenant-General of the Army, relative to a deficiency of pay for June, 1875. Without objection, the resolution will be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object to the reference. The Chair has no right to submit these communications without the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's point of order is overruled.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I insist that the Chair cannot submit these communications without the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from New York object to the presentation of these communications by the Chair to the House?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I do, without the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the House consent that the Chair shall submit to the House the communications he finds on the Speaker's table?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. SAYLER. I move that the consideration of the steamboat bill be made the special order for one week from Tuesday.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. VAN VORHES, by unanimous consent, leave was given to withdraw from the files of the House papers in the case of Captain Alexander White, on condition that there was no adverse report.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was given to Mr. BROWN, of Kentucky, for two weeks on account of sickness in his family; and to Mr. MACKEY, of South Carolina, for two weeks from Monday next on account of illness.

COMMERCE AND NAVIGATION.

Mr. SAYLER. I repeat the motion that the steamboat bill be made a special order for a week from Tuesday after the morning hour. No other special order has been assigned to that day. A bill of this importance ought to be heard. It can be concluded in an hour or two.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let us conclude it to-night.

There being no objection, Mr. SAYLER's motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. O'BRIEN] that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 64, noes 48.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. O'BRIEN and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 47.

Mr. CONGER. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 64, nays 89, not voting 136; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Bell, Bradford, Bright, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Cox, Davis, Dibrell, Eames, Forney, Gibson, Goode, Gunter, Hardenbergh, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hill, Holman, House, Hubbell, Hunton, Harlbut, Thomas L. Jones, Kehr, Levy, L. A. Mackey, Magoon, Milliken, Mills, Neal, O'Brien, Odell, Parsons, Payne, John F. Philips, Piper, Rea, Reagan, William M. Robbins, Sampson, Savage, Sayler, Scales, Sheakley, Singleton, Sparks, Stone, Throckmorton, Martin I. Townsend, Tucker, Robert B. Vance, Gilbert C. Walker, Erastus Wells, Willard, Jeremiah N. Williams, Wilshire, Yeates, and Young—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Adams, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Banks, Blair, Blount, Boone, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cason, Caswell, Cochrane, Conger, Cook, Crapo, Crounse, Culberson, Cutler, De Bolt, Denison, Dunnell, Durand, Durham, Fort, Foster, Franklin, Frye, Hale, Andrew H. Hamilton, Hancock, Benjamin W. Harris, Henry R. Harris, Harrison, Hartzell, Hatcher, Haymond, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Hooker, Hopkins, Hunter, Joyce, Franklin Landers, Lapham, Leavenworth, Lord, Lynde, MacDougall, Meade, Monroe, Morey, Morgan, Morrison, Nash, Oliver, O'Neill, Potter, Pratt, John Reilly, Riddle, John Robbins, Robinson, Rusk, Seelye, Sinnickson, Springer, Stevenson, Terry, Thompson, Tufts, Van Vorhes, John L. Vance, Waldron, Walls, Walsh, Ward, Warren, G. Wiley Wells, White, Whitehouse, Wike, Willis, James Wilson, and Alan Wood, jr.—89.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ainsworth, Ashe, George A. Bagley, Ballou, Banning, Barnum, Bass, Beebe, Blackburn, Blaine, Bland, Bliss, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Candler, Cannon, Cate, Chapin, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Collins, Cowan, Danford, Darrall, Davy, Dobbins, Douglas, Eden, Egbert, Ellis, Ely, Evans, Farwell, Faulkner, Felton, Freeman, Frost, Fuller, Garfield, Gause, Glover, Goodin, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, John T. Harris, Hartridge, Hathorn, Hays, Hereford, Hoar, Hoge, Hoskins, Hurd, Hyman, Jenks, Frank Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Ketchum, Kimball, King, Knott, Lamar, George M. Landers, Lane, Lawrence, Lewis, Luttrell, Lynch, Edmund W. M. Mackey, Maish, McCrary, McDill, McFarland, McMahon, Metcalfe, Miller, Money, Mutchler, New, Norton, Packer, Page, Phelps, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Plaisted, Platt, Poppleton, Powell, Purman, Rainey, Randall, James B. Reilly, Rice, Roberts, Miles Ross, Sobieski Ross, Schleicher, Schumaker, Slemons, Smalls, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Strait, Stenger, Stowell, Swann, Tarbox, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Washington Townsend, Turney, Waddell, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Wheeler, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, Alpheus S. Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, William B. Williams, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, and Woodworth—136.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COCHRANE said: I desire to announce that my colleagues, Mr. MAISH and Mr. STENGER, are absent from the city on important business, and that my colleague, Mr. JENKS, is absent on account of sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question then recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. STONE.

Mr. SAYLER. I submit that by unanimous consent this bill was postponed until a week from Tuesday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk informs the Chair that the request of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] was that if the bill should not be finished and completed to-day it should be considered as postponed until Tuesday week.

Mr. RANDALL. That was the understanding.

Mr. SAYLER. That was not the understanding of myself, and I ought to know what I understood.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order, no intervening business having transpired. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE,] which will again be reported.

Mr. SAYLER. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Do I understand that if the bill is gone on with this evening it is with the understanding which the Chair has suggested, that if not completed it will go over as a special order until a week from Tuesday next?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the order of the House.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. Business has now been transacted, and I renew the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman indicate what business has been transacted?

Mr. SHEAKLEY. An agreement has been come to as to when this bill shall come up again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It was simply a parliamentary inquiry to which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] rose.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Tuesday next.

The question was taken, and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I now move that the House adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. Pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent to offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I object.

Mr. STONE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion to adjourn.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHEAKLEY] to yield to me to offer a resolution.

Mr. SHEAKLEY. I have no objection.

CLERK OF COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. ROBINSON. I ask unanimous consent to submit the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it has become notoriously public about the city of Washington that one Horace Boughton, now employed as clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, has been guilty of corrupt and base practices while serving as an officer of the Internal-Revenue Bureau in Texas: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to examine into the facts and report the result of their investigation to this House, and that said committee have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. RANDALL. The preamble should read, "whereas it is alleged," &c.; not make a positive statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman, and modify the preamble so as to read, "Whereas it is alleged that Horace Boughton," &c.; and, as modified, I ask that the preamble and resolution be adopted.

There was no objection, and accordingly the preamble and resolution were adopted.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS WITH MEXICO AND CENTRAL AMERICA.

Mr. GIBSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, copies of all correspondence with the ministers of the United States to Mexico and to the Central American States relative to an extension of our commercial relations with those countries.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, and others called for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHEAKLEY] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at three o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANKS: Resolutions of the thirtieth convention of the Massachusetts Teachers' Association, in favor of maintaining the national Bureau of Education and of liberal appropriations for its support, passed unanimously at Boston, December, 1875, to the Committee on Education and Labor,

By Mr. CLYMER: Remonstrance of citizens of Lenhartsville, Pennsylvania, against the revision of the tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. DURHAM: The petition of Levi Wilcher, to be relieved from certain disabilities, to the Committeee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HUNTER: Remonstrance of citizens of Clay County, Indiana, against reducing the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. JONES, of Kentucky: Resolutions and petition of the city council of Covington, Kentucky, for the re-occupancy of the military post at Newport as formerly used by the Government, to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of citizens of Danville, Pennsylvania, that the currency shall be based on the credit of the country and convertible into 3.65 bonds, and for the repeal of the resumption act, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LAPHAM: The petition of a committee appointed by the New York Produce Exchange, for the amendment of the internal-revenue laws relating to distilled spirits bearing tax-paid stamps, to the same committee.

By Mr. McCRARY: The petition of Caleb W. Story, for arrears of pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. O'NEILL: Remonstrance of a large number of workingmen in Philadelphia, against any reduction of the tariff, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. POPPLETON: The petition of William A. Frew, Sylvester Gardner, and 310 citizens of Newark, Ohio, for the appointment of a commission of inquiry on the subject of temperance; also for prohibitory legislation on the subject of the use and importation of liquors, to the same committee.

By Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina: The petition of J. G. McElroy and others, for a post-route from Little Joy to Little Creek, via east and west fork of Bull Creek and mouth of Foster's Creek, North Carolina, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, April 3, 1876.

Prayer by Rev. I. CHAMBERLAIN, M. D., missionary of the Reformed Dutch church, Mudnapilly, India.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

ABSENCE OF SENATOR JOHNSTON.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to state to the Senate that my colleague [Mr. JOHNSTON] is detained at home by the serious illness of a member of his family, and the date of his return is uncertain.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for the information of the Committee on Commerce, correspondence submitted by the Chief of Engineers in regard to the trouble caused by unnecessary delay in the passage of tows, &c., through the Louisville and Portland Canal, and showing the necessity for legislation to prevent a recurrence of the same state of affairs, and inviting attention to the rules and regulations for the government of the canal and those using it, published in House Executive Document No. 67 of this session; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of S. W. Millspaugh & Co. and other citizens of the State of New York, praying Congress to pass such legislation as will prevent the manufacture by the Government and sale through the Post-Office Department of stamped envelopes, stamped wrappers, and postal cards; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the memorial of H. M. Stetson and 36 other citizens of the county of Clinton, in the State of New York, remonstrating against any change in the existing tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KERNAN. I present the memorial of the Oswego Board of Trade, remonstrating against the passage of Senate bill No. 373, to promote the efficiency of the light-house service of the United States. I understand the bill has been reported upon adversely, and therefore I move that the memorial lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY presented a resolution of the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, Michigan, in favor of the permanent formation of the Signal Service Corps, and against reducing the appropriations for that service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of J. H. Russell, praying for an act allowing him payment for a steamboat destroyed while in the military service of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. INGALLS. I present a memorial of a large number of pensioners who are now residents of the State of Kansas, whose pensions are payable at the pension office in that State, remonstrating against any legislation of Congress transferring the pension office in that State to Washington. I move its reference to the Special Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WITHERS presented the petition of William Milnes, jr., and other citizens of Page County, Virginia, praying that the present tariff laws may remain undisturbed; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of Wilmington, North Carolina, commending in high terms the Signal Service, and praying Congress to organize the Signal Corps as a separate organization. I move its reference to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a petition of citizens of Lebanon County, Pennsylvania; a petition of citizens of Mercer County, Pennsylvania; a petition of citizens of Lycoming County, Pennsylvania, and a petition of citizens of the State at large, protesting against any modification of or change in the existing tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, presented the petition of Charles H. Clay and 203 others, praying that the law providing for the payment of pensions at specified localities throughout the country may remain as it exists at the present time without any material change; which was referred to the Select Committee to Examine the Several Branches of the Civil Service.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I present the petition of a number of envelope-manufacturers, printers, stationers, and lithographers, of the State of New Jersey, stating that the Government has been for some years past manufacturing, selling, and printing envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards, to their injury, and below cost, and asking appropriate legislation for their relief. I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post Roads.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a memorial of citizens of Mahoning County, Ohio, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented three memorials of workingmen of the county of Clinton, New York, remonstrating against the proposed changes in the tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of printers and stationers of Syracuse, New York, remonstrating against the continuance by the Government of the manufacture and sale of stamped envelopes; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a memorial of workingmen of the county of Erie, New York, remonstrating against the proposed changes in the tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of citizens of Auburn, New York, remonstrating against the continuance by the Government of the manufacture and sale through the Post-Office Department of stamped envelopes, stamped wrappers, and postal cards; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORTON presented a memorial of the Indianapolis Board of Trade, remonstrating against Congress adopting any measure which will impair the efficiency of the Signal Service; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Vessel-owners and Captains' Association of Philadelphia, in favor of liberal appropriations for the Signal Service and hydrographic branch of the Navy Department; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented resolutions of the Board of Trade of the city of Detroit, Michigan, remonstrating against a reduction of the appropriation for the United States Signal Service Corps; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 105) for the relief of Dickson Shinault, late assistant keeper of the light-vessel at Wolf-Trap light station, in the State of Virginia, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 471) to re-open the lands of the Fort Sedgwick military reservation to settlement and occupation as public lands, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a letter of the Secretary of War, accompanying a statement of the Chief of Ordnance in relation to an omission in the Revised Statutes not enumerated in his letter of August 17, 1875, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 684) for the better regulation of the Ordnance Department of the Army of the United States.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 144) to provide for the construction of a military telegraph line from Fort Canby, via Fort Stevens and Astoria, to Portland, Oregon, to report it adversely, and to submit a written report thereon.

Mr. MITCHELL. I do not think the bill was properly before the Committee on Military Affairs. I think it ought to be considered by the Committee on Commerce. If there is a proper way to get it there, I should like to have it referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let the report be printed. I do not ask for immediate action on the bill. I know the Senator's views. After the report is printed and before the case is finally acted upon he can have the bill referred to the Committee on Commerce, if he desires.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon desire the bill to go to the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. MITCHELL. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is no objection, the bill will be referred to the Committee on Commerce and the report printed. The Chair hears no objection to the proposed reference.

Mr. LOGAN, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Delilah Kelly, praying for certain relief, reported a bill (S. No. 685) to place the name of Daniel H. Kelly upon the muster-roll of Company F, Second Tennessee Infantry; which was read and passed to the second reading.

Mr. LOGAN. This bill was introduced in the last Congress and reported from the committee. There is a printed report made by the committee at the last Congress which the present committee adopt, in order to save the necessity of reprinting.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the stockholders of the Seaboard and Roanoke Railroad Company, praying compensation for the use and occupancy of their railroad by the United States authorities during the late war, to report it adversely and ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I present a report in the case, which I ask may be printed, and concurred in by a vote of the Senate.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the report lie on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, if there be no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Birketh, praying compensation for losses sustained in the destruction of his property at Beverly, West Virginia, by United States troops, on the 24th of April, 1863, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 527) for the relief of Major Nicholas Vedder, paymaster United States Army, with the accompanying papers, to report it back. I call the attention of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] to this bill. The committee recommend its indefinite postponement, but I was instructed by the committee, in view of the circumstances of the case, to suggest that the bill go upon the Calendar rather than move its indefinite postponement at this time, supposing that it would be the desire of the Senator from Illinois that it should take that course.

Mr. LOGAN. I prefer that that course be taken.

Mr. WRIGHT. There is a written report in the case, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar with the adverse report of the committee, and the report will be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. There was referred to the Committee on Claims the bill (S. No. 361) to provide for the payment of claims for Indian depredations. It seems that this bill was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; that that committee was discharged and it was then referred to the Committee on Appropriations. That committee was discharged and it was referred to the Committee on Claims. I am instructed to report the same back and move that it be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs, where it properly belongs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am directed by the Committee on Claims to submit an adverse report on the claim of Robert Lowry, of Tennessee. I call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] to this case. The claim is for the destruction of a dwelling-house at the time of the battle of Nashville. The dwelling-house was situated between the two armies, and was destroyed by the order of the proper military authorities. It is supposed that this case may raise questions analogous to those involved in the J. Milton Best case, a case which has been determined finally by Congress. If the Senator from Tennessee wishes to take the judgment of the Senate upon it, I shall have no objection.

Mr. COOPER. I ask that the report be printed, and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be printed, and lie on the table, if there be no objection.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Claims to submit an adverse report on the claim of Joseph Segar, and I call the attention of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] to this case. It is a claim growing out of the removal of what is called the Hygeia Hotel, situated upon the Government property at Fortress Monroe. The committee ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask that the petition and report be recommitted to the committee in order that I may prepare a bill to be referred to the same committee, so that I can get the case on the Calendar. It is a matter that I want to have the sense of the Senate upon. I have no doubt the report is in strict accordance with the law; but I think the exigency of the case is such as to entitle the party to relief.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Let the report lie on the table and be printed, if that is in order, and the Senator can introduce his bill and have it referred to the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill (S. No. 637) to provide for the payment of bounties, &c., to colored soldiers and sailors and their heirs, and the petition of colored soldiers of Arkansas, praying the repeal of certain laws relating to the manner of paying bounties to colored soldiers and for the enactment of such laws as will place the colored soldiers on the same footing as to the manner of payment of bounties as white soldiers, to submit an adverse report thereon, which I ask may be adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The adoption of the report is the indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have called the attention of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. BRUCE] to the matter, and he desires the bill to lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will lie on the table and the report will be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. CLAYTON. I am also instructed by the committee, in connection with this question, to move that the bill (S. No. 296) to equalize fees allowed attorneys for collecting pay or bounty be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLAYTON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 495) for the relief of William H. Smallwood, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of George S. Kauster, praying for the payment of $41,698.43 as compensation for the rent of certain real estate in New Orleans, occupied by United States troops during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1668) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the deficiency bill approved March 3, 1875, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Claims; which was agreed to.

Mr. GORDON, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 177) to authorize the Secretary of War to adjust and settle claims of the State of Georgia against the Government on account of the Western and Atlantic Railroad, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT CHARLES W. MACKEY.

Mr. LOGAN. I am instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2482) for the relief of Charles W. Mackey, late first lieutenant Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps, to report it without amendment; and I ask for action at the present time. It is a very short bill.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of War to correct the record of the dismissal of Charles W. Mackey, first lieutenant Company C, Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps, and grant him an honorable discharge from the Army, to date July 11, 1863.

Mr. WITHERS. I hope the Senator from Illinois will give us some explanation of the necessity which requires the passage of this bill.

Mr. LOGAN. If the Secretary will read the indorsements on the back of the paper accompanying the bill, they will explain fully to the Senator what it means.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

If Governor Curtin shall say to me in writing that he desires to appoint C. W. Mackey to a military office, I will remove the disability and allow him to do so.

A. LINCOLN.

NOVEMBER 9, 1863.

I desire to appoint C. W. Mackey to a military office in the Pennsylvania Volunteers as soon as an opportunity offers, and ask that the disability be immediately removed (by reason of his dismissal) for that purpose.

A. G. CURTIN.

NOVEMBER 25, 1863.

Disability removed according to the foregoing.

A. LINCOLN.

DECEMBER 10, 1863.

Mr. LOGAN. The disability was occasioned by the finding of a court-martial and it was removed by the President, which does not appear of record. This bill is merely to correct the record so that it may give him an honorable discharge as intended by the order of the President. That is all.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. ANTHONY. I believe that there is no unfinished business for to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is not yet concluded.

Mr. ANTHONY. I was going to make a motion which does not apply to the morning hour. I move that at the expiration of the morning hour the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar under the rule upon which we have been acting, considering unobjected cases only.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope that the Senator from Rhode Island will allow me to move to take up a bill that I do not think it will take ten minutes to pass, and to which I am sure there will be no objection. Then I shall have no objection to the course he proposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. My motion only applies at the expiration of the morning hour at one o'clock.

Mr. THURMAN. I cannot very well get my bill up before that time.

Mr. ANTHONY. I shall not object to the Senator's bill. Will the Senator yield to this motion, to apply at the expiration of the morning hour?

Mr. THURMAN. I do not object to the motion at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that at the expiration of the morning hour the Senate proceed with the Calendar under what is known as the Anthony rule.

Mr. MORTON. I think I shall have to object to that.

Mr. COCKRELL. To commence at the beginning of the Calendar?

Mr. ANTHONY. To commence where the last consideration of the Calendar was left off, so as to go through it. I shall not object to what the Senator from Ohio proposes.

Mr. MORTON. I rise with morning business. I wish to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Bills are in order.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate to take up Senate bill No. 332. I do not believe it will take five minutes.

Mr. MORTON. I have a bill to introduce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana rises with morning business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I give notice to the Senate that I will ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of executive business at two o'clock to-day.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. MORTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 686) to amend the second, fourth, and fifth sections of an act to enforce the right of citizens of the United States to vote in the several States of this Union, and for other purposes, approved May 31, 1870, and as a substitute for sections 5506 and 5507 of the Revised Statutes; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MORTON. The object of the bill is to so amend the law called the enforcement act as to bring it within the decision of the Supreme Court, and I venture to ask the speedy attention of the Committee on the Judiciary to the bill. I move that the bill be printed and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask leave without previous notice to introduce a bill for a sinking fund for the Central Pacific Railroad Company in its relations with the United States. This bill has been sent to me with a long communication from the vice-president of that company, which I have scarcely had time to read, and of course I have no opinion upon the merits of the matter. I ask that it may be printed together with the communication and referred to the Committee on Railroads.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 687) to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Central and Western Pacific Railroad Companies; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Railroads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 688) referring the claim of John H. Russell to the accounting officers of the Treasury of the United States for adjudication and settlement; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 689) to correct the date of commission of Captain Daniel W. Burke; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 690) for the relief of the heirs of John S. Fillmore, late of Denver, Colorado; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONKLING. By the request of the party interested and knowing nothing of the merits of the case myself, I ask leave to introduce a bill for the relief of Edwin A. Leland, and with it I present a petition, to go to the Committee on Patents also, setting forth the reasons why he should have a hearing before the Commissioner of Patents touching the extension of a patent for paint-cans.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 691) for the relief of Edwin A. Leland; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying petition, referred to the Committee on Patents.

PAY OF COMMISSIONERS OF FOX RIVER IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. HOWE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 692) to amend chapter 166 of the laws of the second session of the Forty-third Congress.

Mr. HOWE. I wish that the bill may be reported at length and that the Senate will allow me to make a statement of three minutes about it, and then I shall ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to put it on its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read the first time at length.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the $25,000 which, under the second section of the act entitled "An act to aid in the improvement of the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin," approved March 3, 1875, is appropriated to the payment of the property taken under said act as is required to pay the salaries of commissioners appointed by the court to assess the damages for the property so taken and other necessary legal fees, may be applied by the Secretary of War to such uses.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read the second time and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOWE. The Government is improving the Fox and Wisconsin Rivers in the State of Wisconsin. It was supposed to be necessary to obtain the right of way for the location of dams and canals. Last year Congress passed an act authorizing the damages in such cases to be ascertained under the laws of the State of Wisconsin. Those damages are ascertained by the appointment of commissioners by the court. The act appropriated a sum not exceeding $25,000 to pay those damages. Commissioners have been appointed, have been taking testimony and passing upon cases. The question has arisen how those commissioners are to be paid. The Attorney-General a few days since gave an opinion that he could not pay them out of the $25,000. The sole object of this bill is to authorize the Secretary of War to apply so much of that $25,000 as is required to paying the salaries of the commissioners and other necessary legal fees. We do not know of a dollar of legal fees outside of the salaries of the commissioners. The bill appropriates no new sum, but simply authorizes so much as is necessary to pay the salaries out of the $25,000 appropriated last year to be applied to that purpose.

Mr. COCKRELL. Has the bill been referred to a committee and reported?

Mr. HOWE. I stated the whole purpose of the bill. It has not been reported. It has been shown to the chairman of the Committee on Commerce and the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July, 9, 1842; and

A bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. No. 58) to pay the First National Bank of Saint Albans, in the county of Franklin and State of Vermont, the value of certain United States Treasury notes held by said bank as financial agent of the United States, and forcibly taken therefrom by raiders from Canada in October, 1864;

A bill (S. No. 632) to suspend the sale of the jail on Judiciary Square, and for other purposes; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 12) declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CLAYTON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Angeline Logan be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Claims.

DISTRICT JAIL ACCOMMODATIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia are hereby directed to inquire what additional jail accommodations are required for the use of the District of Columbia, and to report thereon.

POSTAGE ON THIRD-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish to give notice to the Senate that on Wednesday morning I will ask them to take up and consider a bill reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, regulating the transmission of third-class mail matter in the mail. It is a very important question. On that occasion I will endeavor to state to the Senate the information and the reasons upon which the committee directed me to report the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine gives notice that on Wednesday next he will endeavor to obtain the floor for the purpose of considering the bill he has named.

Mr. HAMLIN. I wish also to say that this bill, in and of itself, could have been long since reported, but the committee have been very industriously examining all the various branches of the Department for the purpose of ascertaining if they cannot bring the service to some point nearer to a self-sustaining condition, and the delay has been occasioned mainly by examining or trying to examine as well as they could all the various questions having a bearing upon that point.

COUNTING OF ELECTORAL VOTES.

Mr. MORTON. There is a motion pending to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. No. 1) to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon. The motion was entered by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN.] I hope, if the motion is not to be withdrawn, the Senator will be prepared to have it taken up and disposed of to-morrow morning.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say that, if I cannot be ready by to-morrow morning, I will try to be ready by the day after to-morrow or at the very earliest moment. I have been so much engaged in other matters that I could not attend to it. I want to prepare an amendment and desire to have the case considered without delay. I will try and call it up at the earliest possible day I can. I now ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 332.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to move, if in order, to take up the motion submitted by myself some time ago to reconsider the vote by which the bill fixing the salary of the President of the United States was passed. I made that motion to accommodate others and not myself, and I do not wish to cause delay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield for that purpose?

Mr. THURMAN. No; that will take up too much time. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 332. I do not think it will take ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.'"

The bill was reported by the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill, and in lieu thereof to insert—

That section 12 of said act be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows: After the word "committed," in line 44, insert: "Provided also, That no voluntary assignment by a debtor or debtors of all his or their property, heretofore or hereafter made in good faith for the benefit of all his or their creditors, ratably and without creating any preference, and valid according to the law of the State where made, shall of itself, in the event of his or their being subsequently adjudicated bankrupts in a proceeding of involuntary bankruptcy, be a bar to the discharge of such debtor or debtors."

Mr. COCKRELL. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio if this is all the report that we shall have upon this question from the Judiciary Committee? Have not bills been referred to that committee repealing the bankrupt law entirely?

Mr. THURMAN. This measure has no effect whatsoever upon the bills that have been referred to us for the repeal of the bankrupt law. Whether the bankrupt law be repealed or not, this bill ought to pass; because any repeal of the bankrupt law will of course save causes that are pending. Nobody proposes to repeal the bankrupt law so as to affect causes which are already pending and many of which are more than half adjudicated. This bill is simply to provide for a case that has grown out of the discordant decisions of the district courts of the United States. In one district of the United States it has been decided that where a man has in good faith made a general assignment for the benefit of all his creditors, creating no preference whatsoever, and without the slightest fraud either actual or constructive or presumptive, nevertheless, owing to the particular wording of the bankrupt law, if a year after, or two years afterward, or any time afterward, that man is put into involuntary bankruptcy, the bare fact that he had made this general assignment for the benefit of all his creditors without preference, (a thing which the Supreme Court, in speaking in a bankruptcy case, has said is a meritorious and commendable thing,) has been held to prevent his discharge in bankruptcy. Other courts have held differently; and it is to put an end to these discordant decisions, which make the bankrupt law one thing in one district and another thing in another district, that this bill is reported by the Judiciary Committee. It simply provides what I think the law properly construed now provides, and certainly what it ought to provide, that a man shall not be prevented from having his discharge because he has done the meritorious and commendable thing of making an assignment for the benefit of all his creditors, without any preference whatever, in perfect good faith. That is the whole of this bill. Of course, the passage of the bill can in no wise affect or influence the question whether the bankrupt law itself should be repealed. I hope that the bill may pass.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, I am entirely satisfied with the correctness of the Senator's bill as far as it goes, but I think it ought to go further, and provide that where there has been such a voluntary assignment made it shall not be a cause of bankruptcy at all; that a man may not be put into bankruptcy who shall have made a voluntary assignment valid under the law of the State where he resides, which does not make preferences. Why not go to the full extent of that doctrine? Why should we simply say that this man is confined to the tender mercies of the bankrupt law, which works so harshly, when we may cut off the harshness that arises under it, and make a doctrine that is consistent and harmonious with the State law? Why not go to the full extent of saying that it shall not be cause of bankruptcy at all? I think this is the true line, and I shall offer an amendment accordingly in proper form.

Mr. THURMAN. I hope that the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow this bill to pass, standing on its own merits. The proposition he makes I must say has always seemed to me to be worthy of very serious consideration, and the inclination of my mind has been to favor it; but to put that amendment on this bill would make this bill prospective, it would look to a continuance of the bankrupt law. It would be better to offer that amendment when some other propositions that are before the Judiciary Committee shall be reported to the Senate. When some of those measures shall be reported to the Senate the question will be brought up whether the Senate is in favor of repealing the law or not, and then I am not at all certain but that I shall be in favor of the amendment suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania; but I beg him to let this bill, which is simply to remedy an existing evil, and which does not touch the question of the perpetuation of the bankrupt law, pass on its own merits. His amendment, if adopted, would bring us into a general discussion upon the question of perpetuating or repealing the bankrupt law. But there are various propositions to amend that law now before the Judiciary Committee, and which will all be reported upon in due time, and I do not know but this very proposition of the Senator from Pennsylvania—I do not know how that is—but they will be reported upon, and then will be the time when, if he will offer his amendment, it can receive fair consideration without prejudice to any other bill.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no desire to push the amendment at the present time and embarrass this bill.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, two or three objections occur to me against this bill, and because of those I did not concur in reporting it to the Senate. Without meaning to argue the question, I wish to state to the Senator who moves the bill and to the other members of the Senate two or three thoughts which occur to me.

In the first place, as the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] has said, the broad question about the bankrupt law is whether it shall continue or cease. If that question be determined in one way, it dispenses, prospectively at least, with all bills aimed at its amendment; but for the purposes of this bill and this consideration, I assume that the bankrupt law is to stand. The case made in favor of the bill is that conflicting decisions have been made in different districts, possibly in different circuits. The Supreme Court of the United States was instituted and exists for nothing more certainly and for nothing more chiefly than to reconcile those differences; to act as the final arbiter of just such conflicts as that between inferior courts in different localities, so that I may say that here is a case presented especially applicable to the functions of the highest judicial tribunal.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator forgets that the Supreme Court has decided that no appeal lies from an order refusing to discharge a bankrupt.

Mr. CONKLING. And the court has also held that an appeal does lie and has come to it in other instances involving these questions among others; and, speaking without the decisions before me, I think it will be found that the Supreme Court has covered, and more than covered, a part of this ground; and if the Senator finds difficulty in the law in presenting a question to the Supreme Court, I submit to him that the way to remedy that difficulty is to supply the want and furnish the jurisdiction which he says is now lacking. And I submit to him with a good deal of confidence that that is the remedy in any instance in which the purpose is to act upon existing suits. A declaratory law speaking for the future may be open to the criticism of doing by legislation what pertains more appropriately to judicial investigation and decision; but when the purpose is by a declaratory law to adjudicate rights in pending proceedings, in existing suits, the suggestion becomes much stronger; and that brings me to the next difficulty that I find in this case.

The bill provides "that no voluntary assignment by a debtor or debtors of all his or their property heretofore or hereafter made," &c. It seems to me that the case must be very exceptional in which the law-making power by a declaratory act should step in, speaking of existing suits, and declare retroactively the meaning of the statute which is undergoing the examination of the courts, and which involves the rights of the people. Instances have been mentioned to me—I forbear to state them, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with the facts to make it proper for me to produce them—in which large estates now the subject of bankruptcy proceedings will be changed from one direction and possibly from one jurisdiction to another under the retroactive operation of this proposed statute.

Therefore, Mr. President, without prolonging the debate, I submit that first of all it would be well to determine whether the bankrupt law is to continue or to be repealed. If it is to continue, this is not the only respect in which it needs amendment. We passed only a few days ago, at the request of the Senator from Ohio, another bill to amend the bankrupt law; that related to the whereabouts of papers.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator is entirely mistaken. It was not a bill to amend the bankrupt law at all, properly speaking; it was a bill to amend the act conferring jurisdiction upon the district courts of the Territories.

Mr. CONKLING. I accept the Senator's criticism with humility. He says it was not to repeal the bankrupt law in any proper sense of the term. Feeling diffident about being a proper judge of the proper sense, I accept his statement. It is true, however, that it was a bill the purpose and effect of which was solely to do what the bankrupt law had failed to do in respect of proceedings taken under that act. Senators will judge whether it was to amend or supplement the bankrupt law, or not. My friend is quite right in what he says; he explained it the other day. It related to the presence of papers and the absence of papers where proceedings were to be had or perfected to which those papers pertained. I am not criticising the bill; but I say that in a large matter of this sort, where confessedly there is a general demand for a modification of an existing statute if it is to be continued, the worthy way, the way to proceed decently and in order—I beg the honorable Senator from Ohio to understand that I mean no offense by these terms—the way of orderly legislation is to take up this statute not by piecemeal in one bill to-day and another to-morrow and a third bill the day after, and make such provisions as occur from time to time, but at large and at once in a general bill make such modifications as in the judgment of the committee having it in charge are requisite and necessary.

If we go on in this way, this being the second amendment to the law within a short period, if every time a suggestion occurs to a Senator or is brought to his knowledge, it is to become the subject of a separate bill, we shall have a multiplicity of amendments which are both awkward and inconvenient; and then if, after all that, it shall be the judgment of the Senate that the bankrupt law ought to be repealed, we shall be legislating touching the existing suits and vested rights and our legislation will do nothing more; we shall have withdrawn from the Supreme Court and from other courts the questions now pending before them, the right to adjudicate which now resides in the courts, and having withdrawn them we shall ourselves by legislative declaration declare the rights of parties in existing cases, the law for the future will fall, and there the matter will stand.

It seems to me that that is not an adequate mode of treating this subject; but that we ought rather to ascertain first whether the statute is to continue or not. If we find that it is to continue, then we should address ourselves to such general reformation, not of a single detail at a time, as may be found necessary in the experience of this law.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, is it in order now to offer an amendment to this bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. MORTON. For the purpose of testing the sense of the Senate on a question in regard to which I think the minds of Senators must be to a great extent made up at this time—mine has been for some time—I offer the following amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it an amendment to the amendment of the committee?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir; by way of addition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order and will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the committee the following:

SEC. 2. That the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, is hereby repealed, to take effect on the 1st day of July, 1876: Provided, That proceedings in bankruptcy pending on the 1st of July, 1876, shall not thereby be abated, but the same may be brought to final adjudication.

Mr. THURMAN. That precise proposition in substance has been referred by the Senate to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think the Senate knows that committee well enough to know that it will give it a serious and impartial consideration, and report in time for the Senate to act. I believe I am correct in saying that a bill has already passed the House of Representatives for the repeal of the bankrupt law, and that bill has been referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate. Now, if the Senator from Indiana wishes to speed the repeal, the way to do it is to have a report on that bill which is in substance the same as his amendment; and if a majority of the Senate are in favor of the repeal, then that House bill will pass and become a law, and there will be an end of the matter. But I do respectfully protest against adding to this bill (which is to remedy an evil that ought not to exist, which is for a single purpose, easily comprehended, and about which I am sure there can be no two opinions in the Senate) so great a proposition, and one that will give rise to such extended debate as that proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

I am not now here to say whether the bankrupt law should be repealed or not repealed. I tried to get it repealed in the session of 1873-'74, but a clear and decided majority of the Senate were opposed to the repeal. What the sense of the Senate now is, I do not know. I knew very well then that I could not even get the Senate to take up a House bill that provided for a repeal of the law. There were more than two to one against the repeal. The consequence was that your Judiciary Committee was charged with the labor of amending that bill; and no duty performed by that committee since I have been here—and that is now seven years—ever devolved so much labor upon the members of the committee who were specially charged with it as did that revision of the bankrupt law. They reported the result of their labors, and it was great satisfaction certainly to them to know that the bill they reported received the unanimous support of the Senate, or at any rate so nearly unanimous that those who dissented from it were very few and those who did dissent did not, I believe, dissent on account of any provision of the bill but simply because they preferred an absolute repeal.

Mr. President, I want to take up the question of the repeal of the bankrupt law, and at the proper time when a report is made upon the House bill; but for this bill itself, I ask that it may be passed because it stands on special circumstances that commend it to the judgment of everybody who will look into the question. And now I propose to say a word or two in reply to the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING.]

He says that instead of this bill I ought to provide an appeal to the Supreme Court. What would that do? In the first place an appeal would be necessary from the district court to the circuit court, and then an appeal from the circuit court to the Supreme Court, which is already more than three years behind its business; and the result would be practically that three-fourths, perhaps, or more of the bankrupt cases now pending or that would be brought within a short time would be disposed of before you could ever get a decision of the Supreme Court. But that is not all. Suppose when the Supreme Court came to pass on the decision to which I have referred, the decision in the southern district of New York, that such an assignment as is described in this bill is a bar to the discharge of the bankrupt, the Supreme Court should hold that that is a true interpretation of the law; yet every member of the Senate, I am sure, will say that then the law is not what it ought to be. And therefore we get no relief from the evil of the law by the decision of the Supreme Court which may interpret it, as it has been interpreted, contrary to reason and contrary to justice. No reason can be given that has the least validity in justice why a man who has done what the Supreme Court in the very latest decision it has pronounced in a bankrupt case says is a commendable thing—that is, made an assignment of all his property for the equal benefit of all his creditors without any preference whatsoever, and without any fraud, either actual or constructive—no reason can be given why, if that man should be years afterward put into involuntary bankruptcy, that assignment, which he had made in perfect good faith, and commendably, too, as the Supreme Court has said, should bar him from a discharge. The object of the bankrupt law in prohibiting a discharge was to prevent men who had been guilty of fraud from being discharged; but here is a case in which a man has been guilty of no fraud, but, on the contrary, has done a meritorious and commendable thing, and yet by the interpretation of a single sentence in the bankrupt law he cannot obtain a discharge, although the proceeding against him in bankruptcy is an involuntary proceeding, and may be brought years after he had made the assignment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will remind Senators that the morning hour has expired. Is there objection to the Senator from Ohio continuing?

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senate to continue this matter for a few moments, because I think we can soon have a disposition of this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. Senate bill No. 332 is under consideration as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I say that an appeal to the Supreme Court affords no solution of this difficulty: first, because you cannot have a decision for three or four years, and, in the second place, if the decision were that the ruling in the court below, which denies the discharge, be the correct ruling, it would only show that the law is not what it ought to be, and we are here to make it what it ought to be.

In the next place, the Senator from New York says that this is a declaratory law. No, sir; it is not a declaratory law at all. It does not declare the meaning of the bankrupt law. It is a legislative act which provides that this assignment shall not operate to prevent the discharge of the bankrupt. That is all there is of it.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. I ask the Senator whether if his judgment was and the judgment of the Senate was that the law as it stands meant something else, to wit, the reverse of this bill, he would advocate, as matter of original legislation, changing and reversing the statute in respect of cases already adjudicated and pending adjudication?

Mr. THURMAN. Not in regard to cases already adjudicated.

Mr. CONKLING. Is not this retroactive?

Mr. THURMAN. It does not affect cases adjudicated at all. It cannot affect them.

Mr. CONKLING. Does it not affect existing cases?

Mr. THURMAN. It affects pending cases.

Mr. CONKLING. I understand the Senator from Ohio at this moment to deny that this is a declaratory act. He says it is original legislation making this the meaning of the law, no matter what was the meaning before. My inquiry is whether, if the effect of this bill is to reverse the meaning of the statute in this regard, he would advocate the passage of such a bill to take effect on existing cases?

Mr. THURMAN. Certainly, sir, or any other evil in the law, whether it takes effect upon existing cases or not; and we do it every day. When we reported the bill to amend the bankrupt law, we made it operate upon existing cases, and it affected them in a multitude of instances. We made it necessary for the petitioner in bankruptcy in cases already pending to obtain within a certain limited time mentioned in the bill the consent or concurrence of a certain proportion of the creditors in number and in value of their claims. In various other ways we made that law applicable to existing cases. We do it every day. What injustice, pray, is there in doing it? What injustice in this particular case is there? If it is right that in a future case, a case brought after the passage of this bill, the effect of an assignment should not bar a discharge, is it not equally right in a case that is pending? The discharge is the last thing; the administration of the estate is all gone before the discharge takes place; the creditors have received the benefit of the bankrupt's estate, and the sole question that is left is whether he shall receive a discharge or not. If it would be right in a case that is brought to-day or to-morrow or next week that his assignment such as is described in this bill should not bar his discharge, it is just as right in reference to suits that are now pending. It is not a declaratory law at all. What is the understanding of a declaratory law? A declaratory law is intended to operate from the enactment of the statute whose meaning it declares; and although some courts have held, and certainly all courts will hold in regard to criminal laws, that a declaratory law cannot have a retroactive operation because that would be an ex post facto law, yet in regard to laws of a civil nature alone, courts have again and again given effect to laws that were retrospective, which were declaratory and became retrospective by their operation. I admit that there are limitations upon that. I admit that no declaratory law by its retrospective operation can in any proper judicature destroy intervening vested rights; and that is a limitation that sensible courts put always upon declaratory laws. But where the law is not criminal in its nature, and therefore not ex post facto—and we know that the provision against ex post facto laws relates to criminal proceedings alone—and where in its retrospective character it interferes with no intervening vested rights whatsoever, but stands simply upon public policy, the courts have not hesitated to give it a retrospective effect, because it was the interest of justice and according to the intent of the law-making power that the law should be what it is declared to mean.

This is the case here. There is no intervening right here that will be affected by this bill if it pass; nothing of the kind whatsoever. It is a simple measure which appeals to the common sense and justice of the Senate. It simply appeals to them to remedy an evil in the bankrupt law by which one of the most meritorious men in the community may be prevented from having the benefit of that law which men not half as meritorious are every day receiving.

The Senator from New York says that the proper, decent, and orderly mode would be to bring in all these amendments to the bankrupt law in one bill. That is simply to defeat the whole thing. I say that a much better way to do is to bring in a proposition about which I think there can hardly be two opinions, and let it stand on its own merits, untrammeled by propositions that necessarily give rise to debate and that may be questionable. That is a sufficient answer to that, as it seems to me.

And now, in conclusion, I beg the attention of the Senator from Indiana for a moment. I do hope, in view of what I have stated about this particular measure, and having the certainty that the bill which has passed the House of Representatives for the repeal of the bankrupt law will be reported upon by the Judiciary Committee in ample time to allow the Senate to act upon it, that he will not embarrass this bill by insisting upon his amendment. I hope he will see that it may be proper to withdraw the amendment and let the bill which has passed the House and which will soon be reported upon by the Judiciary Committee come up, when the question presented by his amendment can be fully and intelligently considered.

Mr. WRIGHT. I rise to second the request made by the Senator from Ohio, that the Senator from Indiana will withdraw this amendment. The question that is now before the Senate is the amendment he has offered, which proposes to repeal the bankrupt law. Upon the merits of that proposition I have nothing to say at present; but I have something to say and a mere suggestion to make in reference to the time and the occasion and the opportunity sought for making the proposed repeal. I do not think this method of legislation is advisable. The question is one of immense magnitude, of the very greatest importance to the entire interests of the country. It is a question of such magnitude and such importance that it ought to have the careful, deliberate consideration of a committee of this body; that committee ought to report upon it; and upon that report the question should be considered by the Senate. I do not think it is quite fair to the committee. I do not think it is right before the Senate and its business. I do not think it is just to the great interests involved that upon a bill of this kind, as to which there is perhaps little question, a measure of such magnitude should be sought to be incorporated. I therefore ask and urge that the Senator from Indiana will withdraw his amendment and not precipitate this question upon the Senate on this bill; but let us dispose of this bill, and if there is any disposition manifested to avoid the other question either by delay or otherwise, or if it shall appear that the Senate Committee on the Judiciary is unfaithful or delays unnecessarily the bill before it, then let the proposition be presented either to discharge the committee from it or take it up as an independent measure. But I beg the Senator from Indiana in view of the fact that the matter is before the committee and having its consideration, not to insist upon having it determined on this bill.

I say nothing against the question on its merits; I shall vote against repeal when the question comes up; but I do not think the Senate ought to be asked to determine the question on this bill. I therefore appeal to the Senator from Indiana, in view of the great interests involved, and the effect upon the interests of the country, and the necessity of having full and careful consideration and debate, that he will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I second the request which has been made. The Constitution contemplates a bankrupt law. After the country had had considerable experience in reference to it, it was referred to a subcommittee, of which I was one; and I know we spent one whole winter in perfecting that law. It has since been very much modified by the Supreme Court by many decisions. The times are now very hard. We all know that if we had not a bankrupt law to-day the Senate would be flooded with petitions for a bankrupt law; and at this time to take away that relief and to have the sheriff pursuing debtors, selling their property under execution, it seems to me would greatly increase the distress of the country.

But, besides, this subject was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. They have not neglected it at all. There has hardly been a day that there have not been petitions or remonstrances coming from various parts of the country in reference to this law. The committee is ascertaining the sentiment of the country; and, if there was any propriety in referring one of the most important measures affecting the whole country to a committee, there is impropriety in considering that question on this amendment. I hope that my friend from Indiana will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the hardest argument for me ever to attempt to answer is one that comes in the form of a request. I think the time is ripe for the repeal of the bankrupt law. I believe the sentiment in my State—and I am speaking more particularly now for my own constituents—is almost universally in favor of the repeal of that act, and it has been getting stronger and stronger for several years past. I think that is the sentiment of the people and of the bar. I have received, I think, more letters upon that subject this winter from my own State than upon any other topic; I am sure of it. I have received letters from some of the ablest lawyers of Indiana, and some that have done the largest business in bankruptcy, and whose pecuniary interest would be in favor of the continuance of the law. I have also been advised by officers connected with the courts in bankruptcy that this law ought to be repealed; that it has more than ever degenerated into a mere instrument of fraud; and I am told now that people scarcely ever expect to get anything out of a bankrupt's estate. They expect it to be swallowed up, all except a small fraction of it, in the proceedings in bankruptcy. Therefore I think in offering this amendment I am but representing the will of the people of Indiana, at least as I understand it, and as my colleague understands it, who is equally well informed with myself.

The amendment, I think, is an improvement on the House bill. The House bill provides for the immediate repeal of the law, and it only saves such proceedings as have been commenced in which an adjudication has already been made. If proceedings in bankruptcy have been commenced and no adjudication had, then they are cut off by the House bill. I will ask the Secretary to read my amendment.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That the act establishing a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867, is hereby repealed, to take effect on the 1st day of July, 1876: Provided, That all proceedings in bankruptcy pending on the 1st of July, 1876, shall not thereby abate, but the same may be brought to final adjudication.

Mr. McDONALD. I would suggest to my colleague that the amendment would require still further amendment. It should not only repeal the original bankrupt act, but also the acts supplemental thereto.

Mr. MORTON. Yes; those words should be inserted. I accept that modification.

Mr. McDONALD. "And all acts supplementary thereto." As to the sentiment of our State, I fully concur with my colleague in the statement he has made.

Mr. MORTON. For that reason I thought it my duty, when an opportunity occurred, to offer this amendment; and while I am always sincerely anxious to comply with the requests made by brother Senators, in this case I think it is my duty to ask a vote of the Senate. I do not propose to argue it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I believe I have never voted for a bill of bankruptcy, though it is undoubtedly contemplated in the Constitution. My own opinion about it has been that, although contemplated by the Constitution, it was not an absolute necessity in our system; that legislation belonging to the States would probably be ample for all that could be accomplished by general uniform laws on this subject. But I think all that question has been settled by the legislation of Congress. The Constitution contemplates a uniform system of laws touching bankruptcy. From time to time we have had them. They seem to have been the public demand. They have grown generally out of an exigency in our affairs. Generally at periods of speculation and from a variety of causes, when great distress obtains in the country, resort has been had to this sort of legislation. If it is a necessity at such periods it ought to be permanent, in my judgment, and the great difficulty I believe has been that our legislation upon this subject has been fitful where it should have been permanent.

Although, as I say, I have considered legislation on this subject by Congress is of doubtful expediency, yet I have come to regard it as a settled question that we shall have it, and that it ought to be made permanent. It ought not to be made, in my judgment, to depend upon any particular exigency in the country. The business of the country—commercial transactions—ought to take place always with reference to the fact that upon this subject we have a settled policy of law. For that reason I shall vote against this proposition for the repeal of the law. I think, however, that this bill does not meet the demands, and certainly the expectations of the country at large. I shall very greatly hope that the Committee on the Judiciary, having this whole subject under consideration, would think it proper that this law should undergo some suitable revision to adapt it better to the circumstances and conditions of the country. But upon this proposition I shall vote in the negative.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise, Mr. President, to discuss the question involved in this amendment except to say, as has already been seen, that amendments of this character presented on the spur of the moment are quite likely to turn out to be defective, no matter who may present them. It has been found so in almost all cases of this character. That is one reason, and a strong reason with me, why I should have appealed, as others have, to the Senator from Indiana not to press it, because it may turn out that it will not be adequate to meet exactly his views and what we all want to do. It requires study and consideration even to repeal a law of this character and leave things in the condition that they ought to be left in if we do repeal. It cannot be done with safety on the spur of the moment, as has been shown by one amendment already suggested to the proposition.

But I rose to say, chiefly, that I think the Judiciary Committee may submit to the Senate, with some confidence, the proposition that we have never yet been unfaithful in reporting fairly and in due season upon subjects of importance that have been referred to us. We have had this matter under consideration in a limited degree. We have been letting it lie along for a little space, partly because other matters of very pressing importance have occupied our time, and partly because we wished to consider and to study the subject and to obtain information about it. We thought it was due to the Senate that we should do so, in order that we might, when we come to report whatever our opinion may be in the end, lay before the Senate the substantial history of affairs under the existing law and the reasons pro or con for whatever conclusion we may come to concerning the result that we think the Senate ought to reach. That it appeared to us was the true way, in performing our duty toward the Senate, toward the law, and toward the country, that we ought to act.

In this state of things for the Senate to say that they will pass this repeal instanter, without any report from the committee and without giving us an opportunity to get at the facts and report intelligently on the whole subject, appears to me to be rather ungracious. I need scarcely say that the Judiciary Committee will consider this subject early and will report upon it with the promptness that we always endeavor to do, considering the amount of work that we have on hand, on all measures; and so saying I should hope, if the Senator persists in having a vote upon this amendment, that it will be rejected, irrespective of what gentlemen's ultimate views may be, but reserving that question on all sides until it comes up properly on a report from the committee.

Mr. GORDON. I rose to move to commit the bill, with instructions, to the Judiciary Committee, to report amendments of the present law, making it effective; but I gather from the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that the committee has the repeal bill still under consideration. I hope, therefore, that the committee will be allowed time to finish it; it is a measure of very great moment. As I understand it, the motion of the Senator from Indiana is to substitute a general repeal for the bill in charge of the Senator from Ohio. I hope the amendment will be rejected and the whole matter left where it is, in the hands of the Judiciary Committee, until we can get a full report on the subject in all its bearings.

Mr. COCKRELL. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the Judiciary Committee how long has the House bill repealing the bankrupt law been pending before that committee?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am not able to state. It has been several weeks before us; and it has not been finally considered, as I have stated, for the reasons I have named: first, we have been endeavoring to get information of the present working of the law and of the objections to it, and in what respects it has been found to be detrimental to the general interests, and the expenses connected with it, and all the other questions that ought fairly to enter into the considerations affecting its repeal; and for the other reason I stated that other matters of pressing importance have occupied the most of our time.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I simply desire to say that I hope the question in reference to the repeal of the bankrupt law will not be brought up on this bill. Of course, if it is to be repealed there should be provisions carefully prepared in the repealing law to provide for winding up estates now in bankruptcy, and we hardly could perfect that very well as an amendment to this bill. That should be a feature of a carefully-prepared law to repeal the existing system.

I should favor the amendment of the law proposed by this bill isolated by itself, even if we are to repeal the law; and I think it is entirely just. When a man has handed over, according to the State law, all his property, without any preference, without any fraud, in perfect good faith, doing it, as is oftentimes the case, at the request of the great body of the creditors, to save expense, I do not think that if afterward that man is proceeded against by some one putting him in bankruptcy that previous act of his should prevent his getting a discharge, if he complies in all respects honestly with the law. I therefore trust that we shall vote on this question alone, and that we shall await the report of the Judiciary Committee on the House bill to repeal the bankrupt act. I feel an interest in it. I have presented a good many petitions from people of my own State praying for its repeal. I have received many letters from individuals and firms doing business all over the Union, as they state, persons who are not of the class who have been in trouble, urging in those letters that the law should be repealed unconditionally. I am anxious that the Judiciary Committee, so soon as they properly can, shall report to the Senate upon the House bill, so that, if they report in favor of repealing the law, they will provide for winding up estates by a carefully-prepared bill; and, if not, they can report their views and we shall have the benefit of them, and then the Senate can act on the measure understandingly.

I am in favor of this bill as reported from the committee to amend the law, and I do not want to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Indiana because I fear that we shall by adopting it put matters in very great confusion. I should prefer to wait until the committee report, as they doubtless will as soon as they can.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I can hardly doubt how the Senate will vote on this amendment; and some suggestions have been made to me which have some weight. The Judiciary Committee have been considering this matter, I doubt not, earnestly, and I am sure that they will soon report in some way so as to give the Senate a chance to vote on the question; and lest it might be thought that I had acted with some precipitancy in regard to that committee, or with a want of that proper respect which is due to a committee so distinguished in its character, I withdraw my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment to the amendment is withdrawn. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that I cannot help feeling that, if Senators will just study it, there can be no objection to this bill itself whatever. It merely provides against a presumption of fraud in law, as it is called. It provides that where an innocent man has turned over all his property to his creditors, perhaps five years before, and it has been distributed and he goes into bankruptcy, that fact alone, if he has been perfectly honest, shall not prevent his getting his discharge. That is all there is of the bill; and, as the Senator having it in charge has explained, its necessity is to provide a uniformity of decisions in the district courts that have exclusive jurisdiction on this question. I can scarcely suppose that any gentleman will object to the bill itself.

Mr. WHYTE. The reason that induces me to vote against this bill is this: Almost all the courts have decided that an assignment of this character, being in contravention of the bankrupt law, being in fact an act of bankruptcy, operates against the party's obtaining a discharge under the bankrupt law; and while this bill declares that it shall not be an absolute bar, it leaves it entirely in the power of the judge to determine whether the party shall be discharged or not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Depending upon his conduct, the Senator will allow me to suggest; depending upon the good faith and good conduct of the bankrupt, as in all other cases.

Mr. WHYTE. It leaves it with the judge. I do not say what will influence that judge in the determination of the case, but it leaves it to the judge to determine for himself whether the party is entitled to a discharge or not. Therefore, I do not see that there is much in injecting into the bankrupt law an opinion of the Senate in contravention of the opinion of the courts; for the courts have almost all decided in that way, and notably in the case before me in seventh Blatchford's Reports, where the judge says:

> The bankrupt law, conceived and enacted in the belief that it provided the best mode of administering the estate of an insolvent, will tolerate no attempt by individuals to devise and carry into effect any other plan inconsistent therewith, nor permit such an attempt to be justified by the excuse that they thought such other plan easier or better.

I merely read that to show that that is the sentiment of the judiciary; and this is merely an opinion of the Senate and will not bind them. They will be just as able to overlook this law as they are able now to refuse a discharge to a party who may be brought into bankruptcy involuntarily.

More than that, I object to it upon the ground that it makes the bankrupt law half national and half State. That is what it does. It makes the party able to transfer his property and control it under State laws while there is a national bankrupt law operating in favor of the creditor.

For these reasons I think it perfectly proper to vote against this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator from Maryland, I think, is mistaken in supposing that this makes the bankrupt law half national and half State. A debtor is entitled to his discharge if he goes into bankruptcy if, without any State law about assignment at all, he makes an assignment for his creditors even with preferences, unless some of his creditors object to it within the four months or the six months, depending under which head it falls, that the present statutes of the United States require for creditors to interfere in the dominion which all persons owning property are naturally supposed to be entitled to exercise over it. So that this is merely assimilating an assignment under a State law to what the debtor may do himself in the one single respect of its not being taken as a matter of law as an act of fraud any more than a private assignment where there was no State law about assignments would be.

My friend says that the judge will judge of that notwithstanding this law. So he will. It is exactly for that purpose that we propose this law, that the judge instead of being bound by a rule of law commanding him, as he understands it, not to discharge the debtor, if he has ever made a general assignment for the benefit of his creditors, shall be left exactly where all the other grounds of considering whether a discharge shall be granted are left, and that is in the judgment of the judge of the court having the matter in charge guided by what the statute says. If he finds that the debtor has acted in good faith in respect of his conduct toward his debtors, he may be entitled to a discharge. The judges now say, some of them, "No matter how honest this man is, though we are satisfied that he has done the best thing possible for his creditors to the satisfaction of all of them, the law says he shall not be discharged because an assignment of this character is in a technical sense a fraud upon the law, although it was really a most moral and meritorious thing in the particular case." It is to obviate that and put this matter of general assignments exactly where all the other action of the debtor is that we propose this bill.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, I was really not aware until I found that a decision to the effect had been made in the circuit court of New York that a fair and bona fide assignment of property for the benefit of creditors, made in accordance with the laws of the State, although in contravention of the general bankrupt law of the United States, could be considered a bar to the discharge of the debtor. I very well know of more than one case of which I have had individual experience, where there was an assignment perfectly fair and bona fide for the benefit of creditors generally, and yet invading a jurisdiction which had been conferred exclusively on United States courts, where the assignment was set aside in the United States courts by the assignee proceeding under the bankrupt act; but I never knew until very lately that while a bona fide assignment for the benefit of creditors was an act of bankruptcy, yet that it should be considered a bar to discharge. Such a result, however, it seems has been reached by the adjudication of one of the courts of this country, and I certainly think it should be relieved against. The question is one of good faith and equity. The object of the law is the appropriation of the entire property of a debtor toward his then existing debts, and the United States law provides for that, and that upon distributing his property in accordance with the statute he shall be a free man from that day as to all debts theretofore contracted. That he should under the laws of his State and in good faith, but not under the precise machinery of the United States law, have sought thus to place his property in trust for the benefit of his creditors generally is not surely a moral offense, and I did not know that it could be considered a legal offense; but if, under the construction of the bankrupt law of the United States, such an assignment if made bona fide may still be considered a bar to the discharge of that debtor, I think it is high time that the remedy was applied by legislation. Therefore it is that I shall cheerfully vote for this amendment to the law, believing that it rectifies a condition of law which I did not know before existed.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Delaware, and also with the Senator from Vermont, that this bill ought to pass. The necessity for it is that it has been held by one of the courts of the United States, and by only one yet, so far as I have heard, that an assignment made by a debtor in perfect good faith, and for the equal distribution of all his property among his creditors, is to prevent his discharge under the bankrupt law. Why is this? What does the bankrupt law seek but that equal distribution? Nothing else. He is then disbarred from getting a discharge simply because he has undertaken to do without the aid of the United States courts what they seek to compel him to do by the aid of the United States courts, and without any expense, as the Senator from New York [Mr. KERNAN] very properly suggests. It seems to me very clear that this is precisely what ought to be done even as to pending cases, and therefore I shall support this bill.

But I wish here to say that I am also in favor of the absolute repeal of the bankrupt law except as to pending cases, and I believe that is decidedly the public opinion of the State of Michigan, which I in part represent. I believe the law itself has about the effect, at least it has with us, stated by the Senator from Indiana, and that the cases are very exceptionable indeed where any substantial amount of assets is ever distributed among creditors. It is generally used up among the officers surrounding the bankrupt court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed. Its title was amended so as to read:

> A bill to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874.

SALARY OF THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. WRIGHT. Is there anything before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] this morning called attention to the motion to reconsider the vote on the passage of the bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States. I ask the Senate that that motion be taken up.

Mr. INGALLS. It was the understanding on my part, if not on the part of the Senate generally, that at the expiration of the morning hour the consideration of the Calendar should be resumed at the point where it was last suspended.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It was so voted.

Mr. INGALLS. I understand, as the Senator from New Jersey says, it was so voted; and if it is in order, I call for the execution of that vote of the Senate, so that we now proceed to the consideration of the bills on the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I inquired of the Chair whether there was any matter before the Senate, and I understood the Chair to answer none. I understand the Senator from Kansas to say that the Senate determined——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is nothing before the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider.

Mr. INGALLS. I had the honor to suggest, although I did not receive the attention of the Chair, that the Senate determined by vote to resume the consideration of the Calendar at the point where it was last suspended to-day at the expiration of the morning hour, for the further consideration of cases not objected to, and in that opinion I am confirmed by that of the Senator from New Jersey, and such I believe will be found to be the case on an inspection of the record.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware of that. The Chair understood that the Senator from Rhode Island, who is not now in his seat, gave notice that after the expiration of the morning hour he would make such a motion. If the Senator from Kansas states that he did propose that motion before the Senator from Iowa rose, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Senator from Kansas does not suggest that he made that motion before me, but he suggested that that order had been made.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood that that order was made by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was only a notice given by the Senator from Rhode Island that he would after the morning hour move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Calendar.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move to proceed to the consideration of that motion to reconsider.

Mr. INGALLS. I wish the Senator from Iowa would withdraw that motion. It will give rise to debate; and there is a large number of cases on the Calendar that we might as well consider as not, to which there is no objection. I think it would result in the dispatch of business and in the promotion of the general welfare.

Mr. WRIGHT. I cannot consent to that. This bill was passed and the motion to reconsider is pending. On several occasions there has been an effort to get it up. I think it is almost one of those privileged questions that ought to be taken up at any time that it is called. The bill has passed once, and stands on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I gave notice some time ago that about this time I should ask the Senate to go into executive session. I do not want to interfere with the business of any Senator, but I do not often press myself on the courtesy of the Senate. I now move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not wish to argue that question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understood that I had the floor to make my motion. I have made a motion to consider the question of reconsideration. I think I have a right to insist that the question shall be taken on my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot occupy the floor till we vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Pennsylvania has priority.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust it will be voted down.

Mr. MERRIMON. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that according to my recollection the Senator from Indiana brought up the same matter that he is now endeavoring to bring up this morning, and the Senator from Ohio, who was then in his seat but is not now, objected to giving consent as I then understood——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. That was in reference to the presidential election.

Mr. MERRIMON. No; this very thing. I understood it was agreed by common consent that it should be taken up the day after to-morrow.

Mr. MORTON. That is another matter. That was the bill in regard to counting the electoral votes.

Mr. MERRIMON. I thought this was the same matter.

Mr. MORTON. No.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I understand that the intention of the Senator from Iowa is only to get the question up, and then he will give way to my motion.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Perhaps we shall not want to give way.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I give way to the Senator from Iowa. I withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States is now before the Senate, and the question is on reconsidering the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 24, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Paddock, Sargent, Sharon, Spencer, Wadleigh, and Windom—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Bruce, Caperton, Clayton, Cockrell, Davis, Dawes, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Kelly, Kernan, Key, Logan, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Burnside, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Conover, Dennis, Eaton, English, Hitchcock, Howe, Johnston, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Saulsbury, and West—18.

So the motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk of the House of Representatives, appeared at the bar of the Senate and said:

Mr. President, I am directed to inform the Senate that the House of Representatives has passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed Mr. SCOTT LORD, of New York; Mr. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; Mr. WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; Mr. JOHN A. MCMAHON, of Ohio; Mr. GEORGE A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; Mr. ELBRIDGE G. LAPHAM, of New York; and Mr. GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts, managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said William W. Belknap, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate will receive the managers for the purpose of exhibiting articles of impeachment agreeably to notice received.

The Clerk of the House thereupon withdrew.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After two hours and forty-five minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened, and (at four o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I move that the rules be suspended so that the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk shall be adopted by the House.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, if, in his opinion, it is not incompatible with the public interest, whether since the 4th day of March, 1869, any executive offices, acts, or duties, and, if any, what, have been performed at a distance from the seat of Government established by law, and for how long a period at any one time, and in what part of the United States; also, whether any public necessity existed for such performance, and, if so, of what character, and how far the performance of such executive offices, acts, or duties at such distance from the seat of Government established by law was in compliance with the act of Congress of the 16th day of July, 1790.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

PRINTING OF A MEMORIAL.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the memorial of Ralph Leete and others, of Lawrence County, Ohio, upon the financial question. It is a brief memorial.

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I trust the objection will be withdrawn.

The SPEAKER. The memorial can be presented at the Clerk's desk.

NEWSPAPERS PAID BY TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. LYNDE. I move that the rules be so suspended that the House shall adopt the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to inform this House what sums of money, if any, have been paid by the Department to newspapers, editors, or correspondents of newspapers, aside from the publication of legal notices, by the attorneys of the United States, revenue agents, supervisors, or others connected with or in any manner assisting in the prosecutions of parties charged with violating the internal-revenue laws at Saint Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee, and when paid, to whom paid, for what newspapers the same were respectively paid, for what particular purpose the same were paid, and from what funds in the Treasury such moneys were paid.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the resolution was adopted.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the rules be so suspended that the House shall adopt the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is alleged that at the present time there are over 100,000 Chinese on the Pacific coast, many of whom have been brought thither under contracts for servile labor, and that their numbers are being constantly increased, to the great detriment of the laboring men of that coast and in derogation of the treaty stipulations existing between the United States and the empire of China: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to open negotiations with the Chinese government for the purpose of modifying the provisions of the treaty between the two countries and restricting the same to commercial purposes.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the preamble and resolution were adopted.

INVESTIGATIONS.

Mr. GLOVER. I move that the rules be so suspended that the House shall adopt the preamble and resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas on the 24th day of January, A. D. 1876, the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That a special committee of five members of this House, to be selected by the Speaker, be appointed to inquire into the nature and history of said real-estate pool and the character of said settlement, with the amount of property involved, in which Jay Cooke & Co. were interested, and the amount paid or to be paid in settlement, with power to send for persons and papers and report to this House:" Therefore,

Be it resolved, That said committee be further authorized and directed to likewise investigate any and all matters touching the official misconduct of any officer of the Government of the United States or of any member of the present Congress of the United States which may come to the knowledge of said committee: Provided, That this resolution shall not affect any such matter now being investigated by any other committee under authority of either House of Congress; and for this purpose said committee shall have the same powers to send for persons and papers as conferred by said original resolution.

Mr. KASSON. Does this resolution refer to the conduct of any officer of this Government in relation to the real-estate pool, or is it a general resolution?

Mr. GLOVER. Any misconduct that may come to the knowledge of the committee.

Mr. KASSON. In respect to the real-estate pool, or misconduct of any kind?

Mr. GLOVER. Any kind of misconduct.

Mr. KASSON. The resolution embraces Senators of the United States, something that has never been done in either House.

Mr. GLOVER. It does not.

Mr. KASSON. It says "any member of the Congress of the United States;" Senators are a portion of Congress. I think the House would be unwilling to adopt any such resolution as this unless reported from a committee.

Mr. GLOVER. I have no objection to modifying the resolution so as to limit it to members of the House of Representatives of the present Congress.

Mr. FORT. I hope the gentleman will include members of former Congresses also.

Mr. GLOVER. I do not feel inclined to further modify the resolution.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will not the gentleman modify the resolution so as to investigate the relations of any gentleman, who may have served in former Congresses, to the real-estate pool?

Mr. GLOVER. I have objected to such a modification. The gentleman is at liberty to introduce a resolution of that kind if he wishes.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would like to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is in order under a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Then it should be voted down if no such amendment is made.

The rules were suspended, (two-thirds voting in favor thereof,) and the preamble and resolution were adopted.

EXPENDITURES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. ELY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department be authorized to have printed such communications to their committee as they may deem necessary for the use of the committee.

SURVEY OF CATTARAUGUS RESERVATION, NEW YORK.

Mr. SCALES moved to suspend the rules and adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to transmit to this House all the information in his possession relating to surveys of villages on the Cattaraugus reservation, in the State of New York, giving a detailed statement of moneys paid and persons employed, and whether there exists now any necessity for any further survey; and also whether the employés in said work are not without work; and whether, while so unemployed, they are not paid by the Government.

The resolution was adopted, two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

VOTE ON SUBSIDIARY-COIN BILL.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin. I desire to state that, on the final passage of the bill providing for the issuing of subsidiary coins, my colleague [Mr. CASWELL] and myself were unavoidably absent. Had we been present we should each have voted "ay."

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. KNOTT. By direction of the Committee on the Judiciary I report back the resolutions and articles of impeachment in the case of William W. Belknap. I call for their reading.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the following articles be adopted and presented to the Senate, in maintenance and support of the impeachment for high crimes and misdemeanors in office of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War:

Articles exhibited by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, in the names of themselves and of all the people of the United States of America, against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance and support of their impeachment against him for high crimes and misdemeanors while in said office.

ARTICLE I.

That William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, to wit, on the 8th day of October, 1870, had the power and authority, under the laws of the United States, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States; that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, on the day and year aforesaid, promised to appoint one Caleb P. Marsh to maintain said trading establishment at said military post; that thereafter, to wit, on the day and year aforesaid, the said Caleb P. Marsh and one John S. Evans entered into an agreement in writing substantially as follows, to wit:

"Articles of agreement made and entered into this 8th day of October, A. D. 1870, by and between John S. Evans, of Fort Sill, Indian Territory, United States of America, of the first part, and Caleb P. Marsh, of No. 51 West Thirty-fifth street, of the city, county, and State of New York, of the second part, witnesseth, namely:

"Whereas the said Caleb P. Marsh has received from General William W. Belknap, Secretary of War of the United States, the appointment of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid; and whereas the name of said John S. Evans is to be filled into the commission of appointment of said post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, by permission and at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purpose of carrying out the terms of this agreement; and whereas said John S. Evans is to hold said position of post-trader as aforesaid solely as the appointee of said Caleb P. Marsh, and for the purposes hereinafter stated:

"Now, therefore, said John S. Evans, in consideration of said appointment and the sum of $1 to him in hand paid by said Caleb P. Marsh, the receipt of which is hereby acknowledged, hereby covenants and agrees to pay to said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $12,000 annually, payable quarterly in advance, in the city of New York aforesaid; said sum to be so payable during the first year of this agreement absolutely and under all circumstances, anything hereinafter contained to the contrary notwithstanding; and thereafter said sum shall be so payable, unless increased or reduced in amount, in accordance with the subsequent provisions of this agreement.

"In consideration of the premises, it is mutually agreed between the parties aforesaid as follows, namely:

"First. This agreement is made on the basis of seven cavalry companies of the United States Army, which are now stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Second. If at the end of the first year of this agreement the forces of the United States Army stationed at Fort Sill aforesaid shall be increased or diminished not to exceed one hundred men, then this agreement shall remain in full force and unchanged for the next year. If, however, the said forces shall be increased or diminished beyond the number of one hundred men, then the amount to be paid under this agreement by said John S. Evans to said Caleb P. Marsh shall be increased or reduced in accordance therewith and in proper proportion thereto. The above rule laid down for the continuation of this agreement at the close of the first year thereof shall be applied at the close of each succeeding year so long as this agreement shall remain in force and effect.

"Third. This agreement shall remain in force and effect so long as said Caleb P. Marsh shall hold or control, directly or indirectly, the appointment and position of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Fourth. This agreement shall take effect from the date and day the Secretary of War aforesaid shall sign the commission of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid, said commission to be issued to said John S. Evans at the instance and request of said Caleb P. Marsh, and solely for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this agreement.

"Fifth. Exception is hereby made in regard to the first quarterly payment under this agreement, it being agreed and understood that the same may be paid at any time within the next thirty days after the said Secretary of War shall sign the aforesaid commission of post-trader at Fort Sill.

"Sixth. Said Caleb P. Marsh is at all times, at the request of said John S. Evans, to use any proper influence he may have with said Secretary of War for the protection of said John S. Evans while in the discharge of his legitimate duties in the conduct of the business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid.

"Seventh. Said John S. Evans is to conduct the said business of post-trader at Fort Sill aforesaid solely on his own responsibility and in his own name, it being expressly agreed and understood that said Caleb P. Marsh shall assume no liability in the premises whatever.

"Eighth. And it is expressly understood and agreed that the stipulations and covenants aforesaid are to apply to and bind the heirs, executors, and administrators of the respective parties.

"In witness whereof the parties to these presents have hereunto set their hands and seals the day and year first above written.

"JOHN S. EVANS. [SEAL.]
"C. P. MARSH. [SEAL.]

"Signed, sealed, and delivered in presence of—
"E. T. BARTLETT."

That thereafter, to wit, on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War aforesaid, did, at the instance and request of said Marsh, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at Fort Sill, the military post aforesaid, and in consideration of said appointment of said Evans, so made by him as Secretary of War as aforesaid, the said Belknap did, on or about the 2d day of November, 1870, unlawfully and corruptly receive from said Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, and that at divers times thereafter, to wit, on or about the 17th day of January, 1871, and at or about the end of each three months during the term of one whole year, the said William W. Belknap, while still in office as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did unlawfully receive from said Caleb P. Marsh like sums of $1,500, in consideration of the appointment of the said John S. Evans by him, the said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, and in consideration of his permitting said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post during that time; whereby the said William W. Belknap, who was then Secretary of War as aforesaid, was guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE II.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, on the 4th day of November, 1873, willfully, corruptly, and unlawfully take and receive from one Caleb P. Marsh the sum of $1,500, in consideration that he would continue to permit one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, which said establishment said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesatd, was authorized by law to permit to be maintained at said military post, and which the said Evans had been before that time appointed by said Belknap to maintain; and that said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, for said consideration, did corruptly permit the said Evans to continue to maintain the said trading establishment at said military post. And so the said Belknap was thereby guilty, while he was Secretary of War, of a high misdemeanor in his said office.

ARTICLE III.

That said William W. Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States of America before and during the month of October, 1870, and continued in office as such Secretery of War until the 2d day of March, 1876; that as Secretary of War as aforesaid said Belknap had authority, under the laws of the United States, to appoint a person to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, not in the vicinity of any city or town; that on the 10th day of October, 1870, said Belknap, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, did, at the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and that said John S. Evans, by virtue of said appointment, has since, till the 2d day of March, 1876, maintained a trading establishment at said military post, and that said Evans, on the 8th day of October, 1870, before he was so appointed to maintain said trading establishment as aforesaid, and in order to procure said appointment and to be continued therein, agreed with one Caleb P. Marsh that, in consideration that said Belknap would appoint him, the said Evans, to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, at the instance and request of said Marsh, he, the said Evans, would pay to him a large sum of money, quarterly, in advance, from the date of his said appointment by said Belknap, to wit, $12,000 during the year immediately following the 10th day of October, 1870, and other large sums of money, quarterly, during each year that he, the said Evans, should be permitted by said Belknap to maintain said trading establishment at said post; that said Evans did pay to said Marsh said sum of money quarterly during each year after his said appointment, until the month of December, 1875, when the last of said payments was made; that said Marsh, upon the receipt of each of said payments, paid one-half thereof to him, the said Belknap. Yet the said Belknap, well knowing these facts, and having the power to remove said Evans from said position at any time, and to appoint some other person to maintain said trading establishment, but criminally disregarding his duty as Secretary of War, and basely prostituting his high office to his lust for private gain, did unlawfully and corruptly continue said Evans in said position and permit him to maintain said establishment at said military post during all of said time, to the great injury and damage of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States stationed at said post, as well as of emigrants, freighters, and other citizens of the United States, against public policy, and to the great disgrace and detriment of the public service; whereby the said William W. Belknap was, as Secretary of War as aforesaid, guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in office.

ARTICLE IV.

That said William W. Belknap, while he was in office and acting as Secretary of War of the United States of America, did, on the 10th day of October, 1870, in the exercise of the power and authority vested in him as Secretary of War as aforesaid by law, appoint one John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post of the United States, and he, the said Belknap, did receive, from one Caleb P. Marsh, large sums of money for and in consideration of his having so appointed said John S. Evans to maintain said trading establishment at said military post, and for continuing him therein; whereby he has been guilty of high crimes and misdemeanors in his said office.

Specification 1.—On or about the 2d day of November, 1870, said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 5.—On or about the 10th day of November, 1871, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 6.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 7.—On or about the 13th day of June, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 8.—On or about the 22d day of November, 1872, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 9.—On or about the 28th day of April, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,000, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 10.—On or about the 16th day of June, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,700, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 11.—On or about the 4th day of November, 1873, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Specification 12.—On or about the 22d day of January, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 13.—On or about the 10th day of April, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 14.—On or about the 9th day of October, 1874, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 15.—On or about the 24th day of May, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh, $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 16.—On or about the 17th day of November, 1875, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $1,500, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

Specification 17.—On or about the 15th day of January, 1876, the said William W. Belknap, while Secretary of War as aforesaid, did receive from said Caleb P. Marsh $750, in consideration of his having appointed said John S. Evans to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill aforesaid, and continuing him therein.

ARTICLE V.

That one John S. Evans was, on the 10th day of October, in the year 1870, appointed by the said Belknap to maintain a trading establishment at Fort Sill, a military post on the frontier, not in the vicinity of any city or town, and said Belknap did, from that day continuously to the 2d day of March, 1876, permit said Evans to maintain the same; and said Belknap was induced to make said appointment by the influence and request of one Caleb P. Marsh; and said Evans paid to said Marsh, in consideration of such influence and request and in consideration that he should thereby induce said Belknap to make said appointment, divers large sums of money at various times, amounting to about $12,000 a year from the date of said appointment to the 25th day of March, 1872, and to about $6,000 a year thereafter until the 2d day of March, 1876, all of which said Belknap well knew; yet said Belknap did, in consideration that he would permit said Evans to continue to maintain said trading establishment and in order that said payments might continue and be made by said Evans to said Marsh as aforesaid, corruptly receive from said Marsh, either to his, the said Belknap's, own use or to be paid over to the wife of said Belknap, divers large sums of money at various times, namely: the sum of $1,500 on or about the 2d day of November, 1870; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of January, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 18th day of April, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 25th day of July, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of November, 1871; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 15th day of January, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 13th day of June, 1872; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of November, 1872; the sum of $1,000 on or about the 28th day of April, 1873; the sum of $1,700 on or about the 16th day of June, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 4th day of November, 1873; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 22d day of January, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 10th day of April, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 9th day of October, 1874; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 24th day of May, 1875; the sum of $1,500 on or about the 17th day of November, 1875; the sum of $750 on or about the 15th day of January, 1876; all of which acts and doings were while the said Belknap was Secretary of War of the United States, as aforesaid, and were a high misdemeanor in said office.

And the House of Representatives by protestation, saving to themselves the liberty of exhibiting at any time hereafter any further articles or accusation or impeachment against the said William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States, and also of replying to his answers which he shall make unto the articles herein preferred against him, and of offering proof to the same and every part thereof, and to all and every other article, accusation, or impeachment which shall be exhibited by them, as the case shall require, do demand that the said William W. Belknap may be put to answer the high crimes and misdemeanors in office herein charged against him, and that such proceedings, examinations, trials, and judgments may be thereupon had and given as may be agreeable to law and justice.

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

Mr. KNOTT. As the articles just read are a mere formulation of the charge which was distinctly understood by every gentleman upon the floor when the House by a unanimous vote resolved that William W. Belknap should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors, I do not deem it necessary to occupy with any remarks a solitary moment of the time of the House, which might be more profitably spent in the consideration of other business; and unless some gentleman desires to offer an amendment to some one or more of the articles, I will move the previous question upon the first resolution reported by the committee, which will in effect adopt the articles as a whole.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the first resolution, with the accompanying articles and specifications, was adoted.

Mr. KNOTT. I now move the adoption of the second resolution reported by the committee.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That seven managers be appointed by ballot to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

Mr. CLYMER. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] to yield that I may offer an amendment.

Mr. KNOTT. I will do so.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the following as a substitute for the last resolution:

Resolved, That Messrs. J. PROCTOR KNOTT, of Kentucky; SCOTT LORD, of New York; WILLIAM P. LYNDE, of Wisconsin; JOHN A. MACMAHON, of Ohio; GEORGE A. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; WILLIAM A. WHEELER, of New York; and GEORGE F. HOAR, of Massachusetts; be, and they are hereby, appointed managers on the part of this House to conduct the impeachment exhibited against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War of the United States.

The substitute was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. Did I understand the Chair to pronounce the resolution adopted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. SPRINGER.) Yes, sir; the resolution, as amended by the House, has been adopted.

Mr. WHEELER. I desire to say that, while I fully appreciate the confidence of the House in selecting me as one of the managers in the pending impeachment, the condition of my health, my duties on the Committee on Appropriations, accumulated correspondence, and other business consequent upon my recent absence from the House and the city, all absolutely forbid my acceptance of the position. I ask leave of the House, therefore, to retire, and beg to suggest that there be substituted for my name that of my colleague from the Ontario district, Mr. LAPHAM, a gentleman who by his professional character, his ability, and high standing is every way fitted for the position.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make an inquiry. Mr. LAPHAM is almost a stranger to me personally; and his views upon the subject of this impeachment are wholly unknown to me. While I desire to see a proper representation upon the board of managers from this side of the House, I desire also that those selected from the other side shall be in accord with the sentiments of the House upon this question of impeachment. It is on this point that I wish to make my inquiry.

Mr. WHEELER. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] I say frankly that I do not know, but I take it the House will be as willing to accept Mr. LAPHAM as myself; and I certainly have never made any declaration of my opinion on this case. I am not able to say what may be the opinion of my colleague on this question.

Mr. WOOD, of New York. In confirmation of what has fallen from my colleague, [Mr. WHEELER,] the gentleman who has had the honor of being selected as one of the managers on the part of the House, I wish to say that the professional and personal reputation of the gentleman indicated in his place is beyond any criticism. I am quite sure, so far as the delegation from New York is concerned, next to Mr. WHEELER himself they are in favor of the gentleman indicated.

I will go further and say we have already in the selection of the managers to represent the House before the Senate upon this important question not deemed it necessary to enter into any very severe examination as to the peculiar opinions of the gentlemen who are called to represent the House, assuming they will represent the House in the opinion it has unanimously expressed. As my colleague, who desires to retire from the managers on the part of the House, has stated that his own opinions were never asked, and as I understood he certainly never announced them, I assume the gentleman indicated to take his place should be taken, as we did him, with entire independence and with the volition to act according to his honor in the representative capacity in which the House chooses to place him. I hope the recommendation of my colleague will be adopted.

Mr. HOSKINS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a single word. The selection of my colleage [Mr. WHEELER] is considered very justly a compliment to the New York delegation. Mr. WHEELER in voluntarily retiring as one of the managers on the part of the House, for reasons which he deems sufficient, and of course they will be so regarded by the House, has taken occasion to name Mr. LAPHAM in his stead. I agree in all that has been so well said by my colleague [Mr. WHEELER] and by my other colleague [Mr. WOOD] in favor of the appointment of Mr. LAPHAM. I do not know his views on the question of impeachment, but I do know this, that, living in an adjoining county to me, I know him well and that in all Western New York, where that gentleman resides, there is not a lawyer regarded to be his superior. He stands high in that community, and I feel confident when he comes to be intrusted with the high responsibility of a manager on the part of this House he will discharge its duties according to the highest standard of justice and right. I believe no better selection could be made for eminent ability, high character, and integrity, for intelligence and for prudence, than Mr. LAPHAM.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York [Mr. WHEELER] requests he may be excused from service as one of the managers of the impeachment, and if there be no objection he will be excused accordingly.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York now moves to fill the vacancy occasioned by his resignation with the name of his colleague, Mr. LAPHAM.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KNOTT. I desire the form of the resolution shall be so changed as to place the name of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] at the head of the list of the committee of managers. I hope there will be no objection.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

Mr. CLYMER. I offer the following resolutions:

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the articles agreed to by this House to be exhibited in the name of themselves and of all the people of the United States against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, in maintenance of their impeachment against him of high crimes and misdemeanors in office be carried to the Senate by the managers appointed to conduct said impeachment.

Resolved, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House have appointed managers to conduct said impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War, and have directed the said managers to carry to the Senate the articles agreed upon by this House, to be exhibited in maintenance of their impeachment against said William W. Belknap, and that the Clerk of the House do go with said message.

Mr. CLYMER. I move the adoption of those resolutions.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think we should send some communication to the Senate informing them of the selection of managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLYMER. I have followed the precedent established in the case of the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have forgotten exactly what that precedent is.

Mr. CLYMER. I have followed the precedent in that case, and the names of the managers are not given in the resolutions which were then adopted.

Mr. GARFIELD. It occurs to me, in some official way the Senate should know who are the persons selected as managers on the part of this House to prefer these articles of impeachment at the bar of the Senate. We do notify the Senate in case of disagreeing votes between the two Houses of the names of the conferees on the part of the House. In case of such disagreement and a conference between the two Houses, the very first duty is to inform the Senate of the appointment of conferees. When a matter so grave as this is under consideration, I think in the first instance it would be better to notify the Senate of the members selected by this House to act as managers of this impeachment.

Mr. CLYMER. I have not the least objection to inserting in the resolutions, before the word "managers," the names of the managers on the part of this House. I will so modify my resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I think that will be best.

Mr. COX. I think the precedents are both ways. Sometimes the names of the managers have been included in the resolutions and at other times they have not. They were inserted in the case of Judge Burt.

Mr. CLYMER. I have modified my resolutions by inserting the names of the managers in full.

The resolutions, as modified, were read.

The resolutions were adopted.

Mr. CLYMER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering in the House a bill (H. R. No. 2454) entitled a bill amending the laws granting pensions to soldiers and sailors of the War of 1812 and their widows.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a statement and ask for a previous order of the House, which I think will take but little time, while the order he makes, I suspect, will occupy all the afternoon?

Mr. HUNTON. I will be exceedingly gratified to accommodate the gentleman from Massachusetts, but these soldiers who are to be pensioned under this bill are dying daily. If this Congress means to do anything for them it is time it was done. I trust, therefore, the gentleman from Massachusetts will not insist on interposing other business.

Mr. SEELYE. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the question which I desire to raise will take but a few minutes' time, while the consideration of the bill which the gentleman from Virginia proposes shall be taken up will probably occupy the entire afternoon.

Mr. HUNTON. I have not the slightest objection to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for twenty minutes, if he can accomplish his object in that time.

Mr. SEELYE. My motion is for a suspension of the rules in order to take up and pass the bill authorizing the sale of the Pawnee reservation; a bill which has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Indian Affairs; which has been twice assigned as a special order by the House; and the consideration of which is made imperative at this time by the condition of affairs on the reservation. The condition of affairs does not admit, I may say, of a day's delay.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts if the consideration of this bill will take over twenty minutes?

Mr. SEELYE. I think if the House understands the bill there will be no objection to its passage.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that the bill for the sale of the Pawnee reservation is made the special order for to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. SEELYE. That is correct; but the condition of affairs at the Pawnee reservation, as shown by a telegraphic dispatch received on Saturday and another received to-day, makes it imperative that the bill should be acted upon at once. I think the House will assent to the bill. There is no diversity of opinion in the Indian Committee respecting it. My judgment is that it will take only the time requisite for the reading of the bill and a brief explanation to follow in order to secure the assent of the House to its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to modify the order already made by the House.

Mr. SEELYE. The gentleman from Kentucky, Judge BOONE, was directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report the bill.

Mr. HUNTON. I have not yet learned how I lost the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] has the floor; but he agreed to yield it to the gentleman from Massachusetts for another purpose for twenty minutes.

Mr. HUNTON. I agree to yield provided the floor is again surrendered to me at the end of twenty minutes.

Mr. SEELYE. I think the consideration of this bill will not take fifteen minutes. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] was appointed by the committee to take charge of the bill in the House.

SALE OF PAWNEE RESERVATION.

There being no objection, the Committee of the Whole was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2678) to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation, and the House proceeded to consider the same.

Mr. BOONE. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read in part the bill, which is as follows:

A bill to authorize the sale of the Pawnee reservation.

Be it enacted, &c., That with the consent and concurrence of the Pawnee tribe of Indians, expressed in open council in the usual manner, the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be appraised and sold the entire reservation set apart for said Indians in the State of Nebraska by the provisions of the first article of a treaty with them concluded September 24, 1857, in the following manner: The said Secretary shall appoint three disinterested and competent persons, who, after being duly sworn to perform said service faithfully and impartially, shall personally examine and appraise said lands at their actual cash value, by legal subdivisions of one hundred and sixty acres, separately from the value of any improvements on the same, and shall also examine and appraise the value of said improvements, and make return thereof to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. After the appraisement of said lands as herein provided, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and he is hereby, authorized to offer the same for sale on the following terms and conditions, to wit: After advertising the time of sale for three months in one newspaper published in each of the cities of New York, Washington, Chicago, Saint Louis, Cincinnati, Columbus, Nebraska, and Omaha, he shall offer the lands at public sale to the highest bidder for one-third cash in hand, the balance in two equal annual payments, drawing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from the day of sale. Said land shall be sold in separate tracts of one hundred and sixty acres, and none of it shall be sold for less than its appraised value, or for less than $2.50 per acre. Said sale to take place at some point in Nebraska as near as may be to said land, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior. If any person shall commit waste or damage upon said lands before full payment therefor, his rights to the lands purchased by him shall cease, and the same, together with all of said lands not sold at said public sale, shall be sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior at private sale on the same terms and subject to the same conditions as those sold at said public sale: Provided, That said lands shall not be sold for less than their appraised value, or for less than $2.50 per acre. And patents in fee-simple shall be issued to the purchasers of lands under the sales herein provided for upon the payment to the Secretary of the Interior in full of the purchase price of the same: Provided, That if any of said tracts of land shall contain valuable improvements thereon, made by or for the Indians, or for Government purposes, said improvements may be sold separately from the lands on which they are situated, or may be sold with the land, as the Secretary of the Interior may deem best: And provided further, That the second section of the act of Congress approved June 10, 1872, making provision for the sale of a portion of these lands, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000, out of which not more than $150,000 shall be used in defraying expenses already incurred for the subsistence of said Pawnee tribe of Indians, and for their removal to the Indian Territory, and other necessary expenses connected with their establishment and settlement therein: Provided, That the accounts for said expenses heretofore incurred shall not be paid until after they have been examined and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, who is directed to settle said expenses upon principles of equity and justice as between the claimants and the Indians. And the residue of said $300,000, after the payment of expenses heretofore incurred, shall be applied to defray the expenses of appraisement and sale of the lands referred to in the first section of this act, and to the settlement of said Indians, and to their further subsistence, until they can become self-sustaining, and also in the purchase of agricultural implements and live stock, and in establishing and supporting schools, and for other beneficial objects, including expenditures made for the above-mentioned purposes during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1876; said sums to be available for the purposes hereinbefore specified immediately after the approval of this act: Provided, That the said $300,000 herein appropriated shall be re-imbursed to the United States out of the funds arising from the sale of the lands described in the first section of this act.

SEC. 3. That any surplus that may remain from the proceeds of the sale of the lands described in said first section after the re-imbursement to the United States of said sum of $300,000, and after the purchase of a suitable reservation in the Indian Territory for the Pawnee tribe of Indians, shall be placed to the credit of said Indians on the books of the Treasury of the United States, and bear interest at a rate not to exceed 5 per cent. per annum, payable semi-annually, except such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President of the United States, may deem necessary to be expended for their immediate use for subsistence or other beneficial objects.

SEC. 4. That the following described reservation in Indian Territory be, and the same is hereby, set apart for the use and occupation of the Pawnee tribe of Indians, namely: All that tract of country between the Cimarron and Arkansas Rivers embraced within the limits of townships 21, 22, 23, and 24 north, of range 4 east; townships 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24 north, of range 5 east; townships 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and 23 north, of range 6 east of the Indian meridian: Provided, That the terms of the sixteenth article of the Cherokee treaty of July 19, 1866, shall be complied with so far as the same may be applicable thereto: And provided further, That the sum to be paid to the Cherokees by the Pawnees for such quantity of the land herein described as may be within the limits of the Cherokee country west of the ninety-sixth meridian of west longitude shall not exceed seventy cents per acre; And provided also, That the portion of the reservation herein described lying within the territory ceded to the United States by the third article of the Creek treaty of June 14, 1866, shall be paid for by said Pawnees at the rate of thirty cents per acre.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made to each head of a family or single person over twenty-one years of age belonging to said Pawnee tribe, and residing upon said reserve, who shall so elect, an allotment within said reservation of one hundred and sixty acres of land, as near as may be, to be governed by the lines of public survey; and upon the approval by the Secretary of the Interior of such allotments, certificates shall be issued therefor by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs: Provided, That whenever it shall be made to appear to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Interior that any allottee has occupied and cultivated any portion of his or her allotment for the period of five successive years, and has at least twenty-five acres of the same fenced and in crop, such allottee shall be entitled to receive a patent for his or her allotment, with the condition that the same shall not be aliened or conveyed within fifteen years from the date thereof, and then only with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior and under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe.

Before the reading of the bill was concluded,

Mr. BOONE said: I think the further reading of the bill is unnecessary. It would only consume the brief time allotted to its consideration. I move that the further reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection, and the further reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. BOONE. I yield to my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts, to offer an amendment.

Mr. SEELYE. I beg leave to offer an amendment to the bill, which is made necessary by the present exigency of affairs on that reservation.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following proviso:

And provided, also, That so much of the residue of the $300,000 aforesaid as may be needed for the immediate necessities of the aforesaid Pawnee Indians may be expended in the purchase of supplies therefor in open market.

Mr. BOONE. I have no doubt the committee would accept this amendment. I have no power to do so myself. But I see no objection to it, and I think the information which is in our possession fully justifies it, and that it should be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOONE. I will simply state that we are in possession of information which shows it to be necessary that immediate action should be taken for the sale of the Pawnee reservation. I shall not attempt to make an argument on this case, but shall state very briefly the circumstances connected with it, which of themselves form the argument for the passage of the bill. The number of Indians on this reservation is about three thousand. In 1874, their crop having failed, they asked permission to remove from their reservation in Nebraska to the Indian Terrritory. The Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs gave them permission to do so; and upon consultation with the President of the United States it was advised, as there was no law authorizing a contract to purchase supplies for their subsistence, that they might buy subsistence in open market without a contract, and that an appropriation should be sought from Congress to meet the necessary expenses of the Indians. Contracts were entered into, by which large amounts of supplies were furnished to these Indians, and the larger portion of them were removed to the Indian Territory.

I may state that the reservation owned by these Indians comprises about two hundred and eighty thousand acres of land. The evidence before the committee is that the land is worth about three-quarters of a million of dollars. It is a valuable reservation, and will sell readily in the market. We propose by this bill to appropriate $300,000 out of the Treasury in order to pay whatever may be justly due to those who have already furnished supplies to these Indians, and to pay for their removal to their new reservation, and to buy the supplies which are necessary for their present subsistence. We propose to re-imburse the Government for that amount of money out of the sale of these lands in Nebraska. We think they are amply sufficient not only to pay the indebtedness which has already been incurred, but also to leave a large surplus in the Treasury for the benefit of the Indians.

I would not advocate the bill if I supposed for a moment that it would incur a debt on the part of the Government which would not at some time be re-imbursed, unless, indeed, the demands of humanity made it necessary for me to do it in order to feed these starving Indians. I am as much in favor of economy, retrenchment, and reform as any other gentleman in this body, but the calls of humanity demand of me that I should vote money out of the Treasury in order to meet the pressing necessities of these starving people; and as the Government can, in my opinion, lose nothing by this appropriation, as it will be fully re-imbursed by the sale of the reservation in Nebraska, I shall not hesitate to vote for this bill.

I am in possession this morning from more than one source of information, as by telegrams from the agents of the Indians in the Territory and otherwise, of facts sufficient to satisfy me that there is a necessity for immediate action in behalf of these Indians, that they are absolutely starving, that many of them are leaving their reservation, and will, unless some provision be made for them, be compelled to depredate on the citizens who border on the Territory or starve. Believing therefore, and knowing as we do, if credit may be given to human testimony, that the Government cannot lose a dollar by making this appropriation, it does seem that argument is not necessary in order to induce the House to do justice to these suffering people.

I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BOONE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON resumed the floor.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Will the gentleman allow me to offer a resolution?

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot yield for anything that will give rise to debate.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My resolution will not give rise to debate, and it cannot be debated on Monday.

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot yield for that purpose; but I will yield to the gentleman from West Virginia, [Mr. HEREFORD,] who has a report to make from the Committee on Commerce.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HEREFORD, from the Committee on Commerce, reported unanimously a bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. HEREFORD. I will say that this bill appropriates $918,677.50 less than was appropriated for these purposes last year. I move that it be printed, and recommitted to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON resumed the floor.

Mr. YOUNG rose.

Mr. HUNTON. I hope my friend will not ask me to yield any more. I have been the most yielding man you have had on the floor for a month, and I must insist on my motion.

Mr. YOUNG. I merely ask to have a memorial relating to the bill just reported from the Committee on Commerce referred to that committee and printed.

Mr. HUNTON. I will yield for that purpose.

SURVEY OF THE PORT OF MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.

Mr. YOUNG, by unanimous consent, presented a memorial from the city council of Memphis, Tennessee, asking for a survey of the port; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles:

A bill (S. No. 172) fixing the salary of the President of the United States; and

A bill (S. No. 332) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled, 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes, approved June 22, 1874."

The message further announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill (H. R. No. 2482) for the relief of Charles W. Mackey, late first lieutenant Tenth Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Volunteer Corps.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States, was communicated to the House by U. S. GRANT, jr., one of his secretaries.

RESTORATION OF PENSIONERS OF THE WAR OF 1812.

Mr. HUNTON. I now renew my motion to suspend the rules and take up for consideration the bill (H. R. No. 2454) and that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill amending the laws granting pensions to the soldiers and sailors of the war of 1812 and their widows.

Mr. HURLBUT. Has the bill been printed?

Mr. HUNTON. It has been printed a long time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand it was reported back with amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. It was under a former order of the House.

The question was taken on Mr. HUNTON's motion; and (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill in the House as in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read the bill for information.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I desire to inquire of the gentleman having charge of the bill how many additional names will be added to the pension-rolls and what, in his estimation, will be the additional amount annually paid under the bill?

Mr. HUNTON. I am prepared to answer the question from a report made to me by the Commissioner of Pensions. There will be one hundred and twenty names added to the roll that were dropped during the war; and the annual payment of those one hundred and twenty will be $9,120. I send the letter of the Commissioner to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, PENSION OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., March 6, 1876.

SIR: In reply to your inquiry of the 3d instant, herewith returned, I have the honor to inform you that, of the number of soldiers of the war of 1812 and the widows of such soldiers whose names were stricken from the pension-rolls on account of disloyalty, one hundred of the former and twenty of the latter are supposed to be now living and not restored to the rolls.

The annual amount which would be required to pay this number were they restored to the roll at their former rates would be as follows:

Invalids, Army and Navy, at the average rate of $6 per month	$7,200
Widows, Army and Navy, at the average rate of $8 per month	1,920
Total annual amount	9,120

It is proper to add that, owing to the fact that pensioners are not classified upon the rolls according to the wars in which they rendered service, this Office is in possession of no data from which any estimate such as you desire can be made which would be entitled to more weight than mere surmise.

The letter of this Office dated January 19, 1876, referred by you, is herewith returned.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

CHAS. R. GILL,
Commissioner.

Hon. EPPA HUNTON,
Chairman Committee on Revolutionary Pensions and War of 1812,
House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to say for the information of the House, in connection with the communication just read, that when this bill, or the one for which this is a substitute, was before the House some weeks since for consideration, the Commissioner of Pensions reported, instead of $9,000 a year annual increase, that it would take $39,658 annually; and that, the back pensions being for fourteen years, the aggregate amount for that purpose would be $525,212. Under this bill, according to the report of the Commissioner of Pensions, the annual increase for this purpose would be $9,000 a year, and the back-pay being only for eleven years, would amount to less than $100,000 to those restored to the pension-rolls by this bill.

Mr. CASWELL. I would ask the gentleman if that estimate includes the arrearage that would go to the widows and orphans of the pensioners who have died?

Mr. HUNTON. The only information I have on the subject is the report from the Commissioner of Pensions which has just been read. The principal difference between the former bill and this one is that this bill strikes out three or four years of back pensions.

Mr. CASWELL. I understood that the estimate applied only to the living, not to the dead; is that so?

Mr. HUNTON. It applies to those who may be restored to the pension-roll; of course that is the living.

Mr. CASWELL. It does not apply to those who have died since their names were stricken from the roll?

Mr. HUNTON. I imagine not.

Mr. CASWELL. You have no estimate on that point?

Mr. HUNTON. The House will recollect that when this bill was before the House on a former occasion, it provided that the pay of those stricken from the rolls during the war should commence from the time they ceased to receive their pay under the invalid-pension laws. This bill is a modification of that in that respect, and provides that the pay shall begin from May 1, 1865. An amendment was adopted to the bill before under consideration so as to include among those to be restored to the rolls those who had been pensioned for services in the Mexican war and the various Indian wars. This bill restores the words which were stricken out of the former bill, so that no invalid pensioners will be restored to the rolls under this bill except those of the war of 1812. And the House will perceive at once that, from the very lapse of time from the termination of the war of 1812 until the beginning of the late war, all the pensioners of the war of 1812 must have been too old to take any part in the late war.

Mr. STOWELL. Has the committee made any change in regard to the date of the marriage of the widows?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes, I was coming to that. As the former bill came from the committee it gave pensions to widows of the soldiers of the war of 1812 who had married prior to 1850. Upon the motion of some gentleman the limitation of marriage before 1850 was stricken out, so that the bill as amended gave a pension to any widow who had been married at any period to a soldier of the war of 1812.

Mr. STOWELL. Has that feature been retained in this bill?

Mr. HUNTON. That feature of the old bill is retained in this, so that in order for a widow to obtain a pension under this bill she must have married a soldier of the war of 1812 prior to 1850.

Mr. CONGER. There is a provision in the last section of this bill continuing the pension to any widow, even though she marries again. Is not that different from the rule in regard to other pensions?

Mr. HUNTON. That was done because a pension may have been due to the soldier or to his widow before her marriage to another husband; and, if so, it ought to go to her notwithstanding her second marriage. That was the view the committee took of it.

Mr. CONGER. I would be in favor of that same principle in all the pension bills. I do not believe in refusing a pension to a widow who marries again. But I called attention to it because this bill in that respect is different from the other pension bills.

Mr. HUNTON. If any gentleman desires to propose an amendment to this bill I would be glad to have it offered now, and then I will call the previous question on the bill and amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I did desire that the bill should be considered in Committee of the Whole because of three or four clauses which I thought demanded a little special attention; but we can probably arrive at the same result in the House; we can obtain a full understanding of the significance of the bill under the order already made for its consideration.

There is a point to which I beg to call the attention of my honorable friend, the chairman of the committee, [Mr. HUNTON.] In the first section of this bill it is proposed by its terms to amend the first section of the law of 1871. As I understand it, that law is no longer in existence; it was revised, and is therefore now a part of the Revised Statutes. If I am right in that, the chairman of the committee and the friends of the bill will find it necessary to remodel it to make it conform to the section of the Revised Statutes in order to accomplish their purpose.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. It will take some care, and more time than in the hurry of debate is practicable, in order to make the amendments conform to the respective sections of the Revised Statutes. Merely calling attention to that, I wish to state two or three objections to which, in my judgment, this bill is still liable.

The first objection relates to the first section, which reduces the period of service to ten days. In connection with the cases of certain persons who have heretofore written to me on this subject, inquiring whether it was possible for them to get the rights of sixty days' men, they having fallen short five or six days of the sixty days' term, I have had occasion to become somewhat familiar with the character of a portion of this service, which comes in under the name of militia service, in distinction from regular service. I find that there were very many people who came out under a hasty and informal call; who took their arms and came together under false reports of an approaching enemy, especially along the eastern sea-coast; and who then went back without ever having seen an enemy, without ever having rendered any service beyond giving indication of their readiness to render service if there had been occasion for it. Under the general terms of this bill, it seems to me, all that class of men who were away from their homes for ten days are put upon the same level with men who served one, two, or three years; are entitled to the same pensions with those who were in front of the enemy and encountered all the dangers of active war. I think that in this respect the bill violates a principle of justice and fair dealing, in failing to recognize the proper comparative value of the services rendered to the Government. I regard it as very unwise to reduce the term of service to so few days as this bill provides. It almost abolishes the distinction between active, dangerous service and a simple disposition to render service if there had been occasion for it.

Then, near the end of the first section, there is a clause respecting widows, which restores, as the gentleman has said, the year 1850. That is a matter which the House already fully comprehends.

In looking over the bill further I find near the end of the third section this clause:

And when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge, the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony.

This opens up the difficulty to which I have alluded, and which I have encountered in dealing with the Pension Office in relation to the cases to which I referred. Under this provision, men who were not formally called out, who rendered no service and never were invalided, are permitted to gather up what would be a very loose character of evidence, hardly entitled properly to the term evidence, in order to justify a claim upon the Treasury. It seems to me that in this case we leave the safe rule heretofore adopted for the production of evidence. The previous clauses of the section requiring simply satisfactory evidence, making no specific requirement with reference to record evidence, are sufficient to give the real soldiers all necessary facilities for proving his service.

Passing now to the fifth section, I will say that the repealing clause at the end of that section goes too far. I simply allude to this matter now, and when the section is reached I will call attention to it again.

Finally, the sixth and last section ought, I think, to be stricken out; and I will state in the hearing of the gentleman having charge of the bill my reasons for this opinion. First, the section provides that the surviving widow shall have certain rights irrespective of the date of her marriage. The section thus gives her advantages not given to the other classes mentioned in the previous section. Besides, it goes back nearly eleven years to pay back pensions to that class of men who were removed from the rolls under the allegation of disloyalty, and even pays the pension, as I suggested before, to the widow and orphan children, although the soldier may have perished during the war while acting in hostility to the United States. Of course the fact of the pensioner being suspended and his name stricken from the rolls is an indication that the party was in active hostility to the Government.

This provision, as I understand, has been modified so as not to take effect during the time of the civil war, but to commence immediately at its close, and will therefore pay back pension for eleven years to the widows and orphans of such men, and this, although the widow may have married again and may have ample property for her support.

I mention these objections in the way of general review of the bill in order that gentlemen may examine the sections as we go along and ascertain whether they are justly deserving of opposition by the House.

The Clerk read the first section, as follows:

Be it enacted, That the act granting pensions to the surviving solders of the war of 1812, &c., approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows: That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, without regard to color, including militia and volunteers, of the military and naval service of the United States, who served for ten days in the war with Great Britain of 1812, and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men: Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1850 to such officers or enlisted or drafted men.

Mr. HOSKINS. I move to amend by striking out "ten" before the word "days," in line 11, and inserting "five," so as to reduce the time of service from ten days to five. When this bill was under consideration on a previous occasion I offered this same amendment and submitted such remarks as I thought appropriate in support of it. The House, in Committee of the Whole, concurred in my views and adopted the amendment. I have seen no reason to change my views upon that subject; and I conclude the House has seen no reason to change its views. I do not wish to make any extended remarks, but simply to reply in a word to the remarks made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] in relation to the time of service. I do not agree with him in the positjon which he has taken that a distinction should be made between those who were in the service sixty days or a year and those who were in the service for a shorter time.

It will be remembered that in 1812 the country exposed to the British forces was very sparsely settled, especially near the frontier between the United States and Canada. The few settlers who were then occupying that region were mostly in small villages; and on numerous occasions, as I have heard from those who took active part in the proceedings then going forward, whole neighborhoods were alarmed and came out without any formal call, some of them to serve five or more days, some of them to go to Buffalo and find that their services were not required, that the alarm had been a false one. But they left their homes, they left their wives, they left their little children in utter fear and dismay in consequence of the stories afloat of British soldiers coming over from Canada. And while they were not actually in service, they suffered privations and hardships just as much as if they had been subjected to actual service. Their lives were offered in defense of their country, and a grateful country should reward them.

Now, inasmuch as this bill proposes to include all the soldiers who served in the war of 1812, I believe, while we are reducing the term of service from sixty days, which is now the law, we should put it at a point so as to reach every man who did service by enlistment, by volunteering, or by military service of any kind. I know in the New England States especially there are men who were in the service from five to ten days, and who rendered much important service to the country, although in active duty but for a short time. If there is a single soldier of the war of 1812, even if he did not serve but five days, but who volunteered and rendered service, thereby showing his love and devotion to his country and his willingness to defend her with his life if necessary, I want him provided for in this bill. Therefore I have moved to reduce the term of service from ten days to five, which will include, in my judgment, every man who was in the service in the war of 1812, and I trust the House will concur with me in that amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. If I were to consult my own private feelings, Mr. Speaker, I would frame a bill on this subject more liberal in many respects than the one under consideration; but I desire to pass through this House a bill which will in all probability become a law, and for that reason the committee have been careful not to antagonize the sentiment of this House, and especially the sentiment of the other side of the House. I trust, therefore, that the friends of the soldier of the war of 1812 will not antagonize the bill under consideration by proposing amendments either limiting or extending its provisions. I desire now to call the previous question on the section and pending amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I hope the gentleman will not insist on his demand for the previous question at this time.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman has an amendment to propose I will withdraw it for that purpose.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do wish to offer an amendment and submit a few remarks.

Mr. HUNTON. I will yield to the gentleman to move an amendment.

Mr. HURLBUT. I move to insert "thirty days" instead of "ten days," and if the House wishes I will give my views on that matter.

Mr. HUNTON. I only gave way for amendment. The amendment is now pending, and I hope the House will proceed to vote.

Mr. CONGER. Does the gentleman from Virginia propose to cut off all debate on these amendments?

Mr. HUNTON. I wish to be entirely liberal in this matter, but I do wish to get through with the bill to-day.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois who has moved an amendment extending the time from ten days to thirty days expressed a desire to submit some remarks.

Mr. HUNTON. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes on condition that he will renew the demand for the previous question. I will tell the gentleman that the former amendment to which he called my attention will be submitted before the vote is taken on this section.

Mr. HURLBUT. Now, Mr. Speaker, whenever the House undertakes to consider questions of pension or bounty it is apt to be carried away by exceeding liberality. We ought not to forget but consider these pensions are given for service rendered. Unquestionably the men who turned out in the immediate neighborhood, or at a distance, requiring them to be engaged five or six days are entitled to some consideration; but they are not entitled to the same consideration as men who did longer, better, and more valuable service. I believe the whole idea of reducing the length of service below sixty days is wrong. I believe it is in the interest of mistaken sentimentality, and I hope the amendment which I have offered will be adopted, because it is a just one. I made it thirty days from the fact that there were several organizations which did go into service and did fair work on our frontier, serving from thirty to forty days. Others served from forty up to fifty-nine, but not long enough to come within the limit of sixty days provided for in the law at present. My provision enables those men who served over thirty days to come in under the provisions of the law, and is, in my judgment, only fair and just. I believe I am under an obligation to the gentleman from Virginia to renew the demand for the previous question, which I do.

Mr. HOAR. With the leave of the gentleman from Virginia, I wish to make a statement in reply to the gentleman from New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The previous question has been demanded.

Mr. HURLBUT. I did it by contract with the gentleman from Virginia. I am willing to withdraw it for one moment.

Mr. HUNTON. I am willing to hear what the gentleman from Massachusetts has to say.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, I was merely going to state a fact which may be known to some of the House, in illustration of the undue length to which this bill goes and the laxity of evidence it allows. Some thirty or forty years ago a celebrated Washington correspondent represented the Boston Post in Washington. He was an Englishman by birth, and was, I believe, the only newspaper correspondent then maintained by any paper in Washington—the first of that class. He was a good liver, famous as good company, and on intimate terms with all the leaders of the Senate at a time when it was the fashion to pass special pension acts. This gentleman induced his friends in the Senate to prepare and nearly pass a bill giving him a pension on account of his father's services at the battle of Bunker Hill. This bill was going through when it was discovered that the service had been rendered as claimed, but the fact had not been stated that they were rendered on the British side. [Laughter.] The passage of the bill was arrested by the discovery of that fact. It seems to me now with all this loose evidence to include any person who may claim to have rendered military service for five days is utterly preposterous.

Mr. HOSKINS. Will the gentleman state how his objection will apply to those who served more than five days and will not apply to those who served only ten days?

Mr. HOAR. The longer the service the less likelihood there is of mistake or of fraud in this class of testimony. Where there is a considerable length of service there is much more likelihood of there being a record; much more likelihood of having taken part in some conspicuous movement or battle. It can hardly be conceived that there is any instance of a person who served for five days where the service was not merely in repairing to some fort on the coast, or repairing to some town where there had been an alarm, the service not being actually called for; and the leaving the family in a state of alarm and dismay, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] suggests, is certainly not a ground for compensation by the Government. Other families where there was no head of suitable age were equally in a condition of alarm and dismay.

Mr. HOSKINS. The gentleman mistakes my position. I do not claim that that is a ground for a pension. The ground of the pension is the service rendered by the man who left his family.

Mr. HOAR. I understood the gentleman to say that, though the five days' service may have been of no value to the country, and may have involved no risk or danger to the soldier, still his wife and children suffered anxiety and dismay occasioned by the absence of the head of the family equally with the families of those who served a longer time.

Mr. RUSK. In other words, he proposes to pension a man because his family was scared.

Mr. HOAR. Just so.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose the fact may be known to the gentleman from Massachusetts——

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman from Michigan will pardon me. I promised the gentleman from Virginia that at the close of my remarks I should renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I will renew it. The gentleman may be aware of the fact that volunteers in the war of 1812 who were engaged in the battles along the frontier were frequently killed, who had not served even one day, who came and joined in the heat of battle, as in the revolutionary war. At Plattsburgh and other places men were wounded who had served but one day, or three days, or five days.

Now, I take it that a man is just as patriotic if killed after having served only one day as if he had served a longer time. I do not know what Boston ethics may be, or what the Massachusetts rule may be, but out West we think the man who gives his life for his country the second day after he entered the service is as patriotic as if he had served for five years.

Mr. HOAR. In the case of soldiers wounded or killed, they or their families got the pensions.

Mr. CONGER. I know that. But this is a question as to the patriotism of a man; the man who goes at his country's call and serves five days.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will pardon me. This is not a question of the patriotism of the man we pension. We do not pension patriotism, but merely service which is valuable to the country.

Mr. CONGER. That is the very point I am coming to. It is patriotic for a man, even when not enlisted in the regular service, to respond to the call of his country, and to come and render his services to the conntry for one day, or five days, or more.

Mr. HOAR. Will the gentleman permit me to make one suggestion more?

Mr. CONGER. Let me make one. I think I can make a more interesting one to the House.

Mr. HOAR. If the gentleman will permit me, I was going to observe that if we pension patriotism merely, we should have to give a pension of $100,000 a year to the gentleman from Michigan himself.

Mr. CONGER. I am glad to find that there is at least one gentleman who appreciates my services so highly. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUNTON. How much time does the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] desire?

Mr. CONGER. I have not yet finished the few remarks which I desire to make on this amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON. I hope the gentleman's time will be extended half an hour.

Mr. CONGER. I understood the gentleman from Virginia, when asked if further debate was to be allowed, to say that he had no desire to hurry on a decision.

Mr. HUNTON. Very well; go on.

Mr. CONGER. If all those gentlemen have got through interrupting me, I will, with the leave of the gentleman from Virginia, go on. I can see no propriety in the distinction as to the length of time of service in the defense of the country, provided the service was actually rendered, that danger was actually incurred while in that service, and that it was valuable to the country. Now a particular length of time may be desirable to prove, where there is no record evidence to prove, that there was actual service; but when actual service, involving the risk of life, has been rendered by any person, I see no reason why the few remaining survivors of the war of 1812, whether they served through the war, or one year, or sixty days, as in the present law, or whether they ran the risk of their lives for one day or for ten days, should not be remembered by their descendants now, and placed on the pension-rolls.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says we do not pension patriotism. What is the object of all these military pensions? What is it, except to show to all men in the country that whenever the country is in danger, that wherever and whenever they can render valuable service to the country the history of the legislation of the country shows that they shall be remembered; that if they are wounded or disabled they shall be pensioned; that if they die their widows shall be pensioned; that if their widows are removed their minor children or heirs shall be pensioned? What is it but to show to the world and especially to our own citizens that we in this age recognize the former military services of our fathers, and if occasion ever arises on a sudden call, when there is no time to pass laws or hold out inducements, to show them that the common history of the legislation of the country has been and will be that, if they give their lives for the country, legislation will protect their families when they are gone. Patriotism may induce free services, but it is the willingness to risk the hardships and perils of the service, the willingness of a man to risk the loss of life and to encourage every man in the nation whenever the country calls to step forward at once to take that risk that we pass these pension laws at all, rather than as a reward for past services. It is in that view that I submit that any length of service sufficient to show actual service, actual risk of the perils and hardships of warfare, is a sufficient reason for granting pensions to the person thus risking his life in the service of the country.

Mr. HUNTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and then I insist on the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. There is an amendment to an amendment now pending.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair so understands.

Mr. HOSKINS. I make the point of order that, there being an amendment to an amendment pending, no further amendment can be submitted; you cannot pile up amendments on amendments in this way.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understood the gentleman from Virginia to ask unanimous consent to have an amendment read previous to making his motion to close debate. Objection having been heard, that is out of order. The gentleman from Virginia can, however, move to close debate on the pending amendment and the amendment thereto, and then his amendment will be in order.

Mr. HUNTON. I make that motion.

The motion to close debate was agreed to.

The question was upon the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. HURLBUT, to strike out "five" and insert "thirty" so that it would read, "who served for thirty days in the war with Great Britain, &c.

Mr. HOSKINS. That is the amendment to my amendment, which is to strike out the word "ten" and insert in lieu thereof "five."

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment offered by Mr. HURLBUT; and on a division there were—ayes 48, noes 98.

So the amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. HOSKINS's amendment to strike out "ten" and insert "five;" and being put, there were on a division—ayes 61, noes 92.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. I move now to strike out line 3, 4, and 5, and down to the word "that" on lines 6, as follows:

That the act granting pensions to the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, &c., approved February 14, 1871, be amended so as to read as follows:

Mr. HUNTON. The words proposed to be stricken out refer to the law of 1871, whereas the reference should be to the sections of the Revised Statutes; and I propose to insert as an additional section at the end of the bill a repealing clause of those sections. The repealing clause which I propose to add as the seventh section will refer directly to those sections of the Revised Statutes which refer to pensions of 1812. The bill as it now stands refers to the law of 1871, which was changed or repealed by the Revised Statutes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the second section, as follows:

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any person who is receiving a pension at the rate of $8 per month or more, nor to any person receiving a pension of less than $8 per month, except for the difference between the pension now received (if less than $8 per month) and $8 per month; pensions under this act shall be at the rate of $8 per month, except as herein provided, and shall be paid to the persons entitled thereto from and after the passage of this act for and during their natural lives: Provided, That the pensions to widows provided for in this act shall cease when they shall marry again.

Mr. CONGER. I move to strike out the proviso of that section, to wit:

Provided, That the pensions to widows provided for in this act shall cease when they shall marry again.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read the third section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 3. That before the name of any person shall be placed upon the pension-rolls under this act, proof shall be made, under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner of Pensions, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, shall prescribe, that the applicant is entitled to a pension under this act; and any person who shall falsely take any oath required to be taken under the provisions of this act shall be guilty of perjury, and the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be stricken from the rolls the name of any person when it shall appear, by proof satisfactory to him, that such name was put on said rolls by or through false or fraudulent representations as to the right of such person to a pension under this act. The loss or lack of a certificate of discharge shall not deprive the applicant of the benefit of this act, but other proof of the service performed and of an honorable discharge, if satisfactory, shall be deemed sufficient; and when there is no record evidence of such service and such discharge, the applicant may establish the same by other satisfactory testimony: Provided, That when any person has been granted a land warrant under any act of Congress for and on account of service in the said war of 1812, such grant shall be prima facie evidence of his service and honorable discharge, so as to entitle him, if living, or his widow, if he be dead, to a pension under this act; but such evidence shall not be conclusive, and may be rebutted by evidence that such land warrant was improperly granted.

Mr. KASSON. I think the words "or by mistake" should be inserted in the twelfth line of that section. The limitation in lines 11 and 12 is to the insertion of names upon the roll "by false and fraudulent representations." I propose to add the words "or by mistake," to come in after the word "representation."

Mr. HUNTON. I think there is no objection to that.

Mr. KASSON. It meets another class of cases.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the fourth section, as follows:

SEC. 4. That all applications for pensions under the act to which this is an amendment, heretofore or which may hereafter be made, shall be considered and decided as though made under this act; and all laws now in force in regard to the manner of paying pensions and in reference to the punishment of frauds shall be applicable to all claims under the provisions of this act.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Virginia to the phrase in that section, "under the act to which this is an amendment." I would suggest that either he should reserve the right to modify it at some future time or else offer some amendment now.

Mr. HUNTON. I think perhaps it would be better to put in the place of the word "act" the word "laws."

Mr. KASSON. I think some phrase like this would be better: "that all applications for pensions of the class provided for by this act;" that would cover the case; but if the gentleman is not prepared to accept that amendment I think he had better reserve the right to offer an amendment hereafter.

Mr. HUNTON. I think the proposition suggested by the gentleman from Iowa is a correct one.

Mr. KASSON. I submit that amendment then.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I suggest that striking out in the second line the words "to which this is an amendment," and changing the "the" in the first line to "this," would cover the objection made by the gentleman from Iowa. It would then read "that all applications for pensions under this act," &c.

Mr. KASSON. That would hardly meet the case, because it goes on "heretofore or which may hereafter be made, shall be considered and decided as though made under this act;" there has been no application under this act heretofore. I think the words I suggest will meet the case. I submit the amendment, with the approval of the gentleman from Virginia, to insert the words "of the class provided for by this act."

Mr. HUNTON. It ought to be in the plural: "of the classes."

Mr. KASSON. I will modify it in that way.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I move to strike out the words "heretofore or which may hereafter be made."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman offer that as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. Then it is not in order until the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I understood that this was the first amendment in order, but I will withhold it until the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. I will add that even if the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts were agreed to that would not be satisfactory, because a further part of the section reads "shall be considered and decided as though made under this act." I think therefore, thus, his amendment will not reach the point aimed at.

The question was taken on the amendment offered by Mr. KASSON; and it was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I will not press my amendment, in view of the one just adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to restore to the pension-rolls, as of the 1st day of May, 1865, the names of all persons now surviving heretofore pensioned on account of service in the war of 1812 against Great Britain, and whose names were stricken from the rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862; and that the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, be, and the same is hereby, so far modified as to authorize the payment of claimants under this act; and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States is hereby repealed so far as the same would apply to the persons provided for by this act.

Mr. CONGER. I move to amend the section just read by striking out the words "1st day of May, 1865," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "date of the passage of this act;" so that it will read: "restore to the pension-rolls, as of the date of the passage of this act, the names of all persons now surviving," &c. And then, as a part of the amendment and relating to the same subject, I move to amend by inserting the word "hereafter" after the word "payment;" so as to read: "authorize the payment hereafter of claimants under this act."

In support of my amendment I desire to say simply that, so far as I am concerned and so far as I know the feelings of gentlemen upon this side of the House, all are willing that these pensioners, who were stricken from the rolls for disloyalty, shall be restored from and after the passage of the act restoring them. But we are not willing to go back to 1865, and pay them arrearages of pensions during that time. Let the time when they are restored to the rolls, or from which they shall begin to draw pensions, be the time when the Congress of the United States determines that it is proper to restore their names to the pension-rolls. Further than that I am not willing to go. And I think the reason why the former bill met with so little favor in this House was because of the provision in it for arrearages. It does not remove the difficulty that two years are deducted by this bill from the time for arrearages of pensions. I think the feeling of many members is that the time when the Congress of the United States declares that these men shall again be placed on the pension-rolls is the time when their payment should be commenced, and my amendment is intended to bring about that result.

Mr. CASWELL. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. CASWELL.]

Mr. CASWELL. I move to strike out the third line, which reads, "as of the 1st day of May, 1865," and to add to the section this proviso:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of arrearages during his term of disability.

I do not wish to occupy the attention of the House for any great length of time by attempting to say anything in addition to what was said when this subject was under consideration a few weeks ago.

I wish to call the attention of gentlemen to this fact, that this bill undertakes to provide for two classes of persons; the one class consists of those who have never been placed upon the rolls at all, and the other is that class which gentlemen on the other side of the House more directly represent, and who have been once upon the rolls and their names stricken off for disloyalty to the Government. It seems to me it is a very fair proposition and a just compromise between those soldiers of the war of 1812 who have never been upon the rolls and those who have once been on and have been stricken off, to place them both upon the rolls to-day and let them start hand in hand and live out the remaining portion of their lives drawing pensions alike from this time. Do not give either the advantage over the other. Let those who have been disloyal journey on with the others; and God grant that they may sin no more. It seems to me very fair indeed, and they should be contented with drawing a pension from this time on.

We will be establishing a very bad precedent, in my judgment, if we pay to any class a pension during a period in which they were not on the roll. In my judgment it would be a very bad and a dangerous precedent, and we ought to be contented, and if we are the true friends of the soldiers of the war of 1812 we will be contented, by placing those who have been stricken off back again where they once were, permitting them to resume their former relations to the Government.

Mr. CONGER. I will withdraw my amendment in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. CASWELL.]

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a few words upon the amendment now before the House. It is assumed that it would be wrong to give these pensioners, as proposed by this bill, their pensions from 1865. There are some facts in this case that ought not to be lost sight of. The men who will have the benefit of this law are, without exception, men who when the recent war broke out were too old to engage in military service. They were unfortunate and shared in the calamities of the war, but were not of an age that enabled them to render military service. I suppose it will not be pretended that any one of the soldiers of the war of 1812 actively participated in the recent war between the States.

There is another fact to be remembered: After the war ended, the people of all the States alike were required to contribute by taxation to the support of the Government, in one State as in another, and in every State alike. The people in the Southern States, among whom were those who are excluded on account of what was done in what is called the rebellion, have paid their taxes, impoverished as they were, just as the people of the other sections of the country have paid their taxes.

When this subject was up before I called attention to the fact that it is asked that only a few hundred men out of the vast number who were engaged in the war of 1812, nearly all of whom are now past eighty years of age, and now are upon the very brink of the grave, shall receive this evidence of kindly feeling on the part of the Government for the services which they rendered, before any of us were born, to the country in her hour of great peril, and in a conflict with the then greatest military power of the earth. It seems to me that in view of these facts we might consent that a few hundred men at most who now ask the recognition of the Government for services rendered before we were born, and who limit their request to the time during which they and their neighbors have been paying taxes for the support of the Government and to pay pensioners, shall receive their pensions as all others do; that seems to me to be not unreasonable.

I think, too, I may with propriety remind members that the same people among whom these few pensioners are now residing are to-day contributing their portion of the tax of $30,000,000 a year to provide pensions for the soldiers who fought against them, while those who fought with them are not pensioned and there is no request that they shall be. In view of the fact that these old men are now citizens of the United States and have been from the time mentioned in this bill, that the States in which they live are States of the Union and have been from the time mentioned in the bill, it is not unreasonable to ask that their pensions shall date back to that time.

The amount of money involved is but small. As already suggested, there are but very few of these men—perhaps nearly all of them are eighty years of age or more. They can at most live but a few years. Most of them, too—I know half a dozen of them—are now experiencing an old age of poverty. A pension to begin now would be of scarcely any benefit to them, while if it were extended back to 1865 it might be a material advantage to these old men now passing away, who rendered service so long ago and so gallantly in a great struggle the reference to which always excites patriotic emotion in the mind of every citizen of this country.

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman will allow me to call his attention to the fact that this bill also includes the widows and heirs of those who have died and passed away.

Mr. REAGAN. But only for arrears of pensions. Those arrears cannot go back beyond 1865. The amount involved is really so small that I trust most earnestly this House will consent to pass the bill without changing that feature. Otherwise it would be almost a mockery.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Is the gentleman able to inform the House how many pensioners of the class embraced in section 5 were living on the 1st day of May, 1865?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] has expired.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I regret very much to see the opposition to this bill. I want gentlemen here to recollect that under the old law no man who served in the war of 1812 was entitled to a pension unless he had served sixty days. Now this bill proposes to place upon the pension-roll all who served ten days; so that there is no comparison in the service of the respective classes of soldiers. One must have served sixty days or more, while the other class are now to be pensioned if they served ten days.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I think that soldiers in the late war have never received a full measure of justice. Both political parties have pledged themselves to equalize the bounties of those soldiers. It has never been done. A bill for that purpose is now pending before this House. We have it now in our power to restore good feeling between the North and the South by placing upon the pension-rolls the old soldiers of the South and at the same time doing justice to the soldiers of the North by equalizing their bounties. I hope that no man from the North will be found voting against this measure to restore to the rolls southern pensioners who served in the war of 1812. I hope, on the other hand, that no man from the South will be found voting against this act of justice to the soldiers of the North. In this way we can restore good feeling between the two sections of the country. I should be very much pleased, Mr. Speaker, to see this bill pass, as I shall be greatly gratified to see the passage at the proper time of the bill to equalize the bounties of our soldiers engaged in the late war.

Mr. HUNTON. I move to close debate on the pending amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CASWELL, it was agreed to; there being—ayes 79, noes 64.

Mr. KASSON. I have already called the attention of the gentleman from Virginia having charge of this bill to an expression in section 5 which needs to be modified. In order to make the proper change in the phraseology, I move to amend lines 11 to 17 of that section so as to read as follows:

And the joint resolution entitled "Joint resolution prohibiting payment by any officer of the Government to any person not known to have been opposed to the rebellion and in favor of its suppression," approved March 2, 1867, and section 4716 of the Revised Statutes at Large of the United States shall not apply to the persons provided for by this act.

This does not change the purport of the provision, but merely makes the phraseology clearer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The sixth section was read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to the arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease; and the marriage of such widow shall not prevent her from receiving such arrearages of pension. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner: Provided, That no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the 1st day of May, 1865.

Mr. CASWELL. In view of the action of the House in adopting the amendment to the fifth section, the section just read is rendered entirely inappropriate and useless. I therefore move to strike out this section.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask that the amendment to the fifth section be read, so that we may see whether there is any necessity for the sixth section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 8, section 5, these words: "as of the 1st day of May, 1865."
Add to the section the following:
Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of arrears during his term of disability.

Mr. CASWELL. The gentleman will see that that proviso——

Mr. HUNTON. I confess I do not exactly understand the bearing of that amendment.

Mr. CASWELL. I was about to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The amendment just read has been agreed to by the House. The pending question is on the motion to strike out the sixth section.

Mr. HUNTON. But I wanted the mover of the amendment to the fifth section to explain its meaning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would not be in order at this time.

Mr. CASWELL. We have passed the fifth section; and, as I understand, the amendment has just been reported again for the purpose of information, in order to show that the sixth section is superfluous. Gentlemen will see that the proviso attached to the fifth section of the bill sweeps away arrearages, and therefore there is no necessity for the sixth section, which relates entirely to arrearages of pensions due widows and heirs.

Mr. REAGAN. I apprehend it is not correct to say the amendment to the fifth section does away with the necessity for the sixth section. If I understand the amendment to the fifth section, persons entitled to the benefit of the act from the time of the removal of their disabilities growing out of participation in the war would be restored to their right to draw pension if restored at any time since the war and before the passage of the act. If the person restored to pension should die, then of course the widow or heirs would be entitled to the pension between the time of the removal of the disabilities to the time of the death of the pensioner. I mention this in order that our friends may not assume the amendment to the fifth section renders the sixth section unnecessary. If I am right in the construction, and I think I am, there is still cause for the retention of the sixth section, so that the widows of those who are restored may draw pension from the time of the removal of disability. It amounts to a small sum, but it ought to be retained.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to move an amendment to the sixth section in line 10. I move to strike out these words:

The arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease; and the marriage of such widow shall not prevent her from receiving such arrearages of pension. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner: Provided, That no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the 1st day of May, 1865.

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

Make claim for pension as such widow.

So it will read:

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to make claim for pension as such widow.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is not a motion to strike out the entire section taken in advance of any motion to amend?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion of the gentleman from Michigan is in order, and must be first put.

Mr. CONGER. The object of my amendment is that, inasmuch as we would restore to the pension-rolls the survivors receiving pension from the date of the passage of this law, we will restore to widows the right to make their claim for pension as such widows the same as the widow of the pensioner if he die after the passage of this bill. I think that is just.

The amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on Mr. CASWELL'S motion to strike out the sixth section.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 75.

Mr. CASWELL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 102, not voting 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Ballou, Bell, Blair, Bradley, Horatio C. Burchard, Burleigh, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Chittenden, Cochrane, Conger, Crapo, Crounse, Cutler, Davy, De Bolt, Denison, Dunnell, Durand, Eames, Evans, Fort, Foster, Freeman, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Goodin, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Benjamin W. Townsend, Van Vorhes, Charles C. B. Walker, Walling, Walls, Ward, Whiting, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, James Williams, James D. Williams, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodworth, and Young—95.

So the House refused to strike out the sixth section.

During the vote,

Mr. MILLIKEN stated that his colleague, Mr. BROWN, absent by leave of the House, had been called away on account of illness in his family, and if present would vote in the negative.

Mr. KEHR stated that his colleague, Mr. PHILIPS, was detained from the House by illness.

Mr. RIDDLE stated that Mr. HAYMOND was absent by leave of the House.

Mr. MACDOUGALL stated his colleague, Mr. DAVY, who was absent, if present would vote in the affirmative.

Mr. HATCHER stated that Mr. BLAND had been called home by sickness in his family.

Mr. TEESE stated that his colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, who was absent by leave of the House, had been called away by important business.

Mr. COX stated that Mr. HOLMAN was absent on account of illness.

Mr. COCHRANE stated that his colleague, Mr. STENGER, who was absent by leave of the House, had been called away by important business.

Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina, stated that his colleague Mr. MACKEY was still confined to his room by sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. HUNTON obtained the floor.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is this section open to amendment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is.

Mr. HUNTON. As the House has refused to strike out the sixth section, I move now to amend by striking out all after the words "prior to," in line 16 of the section, and in lieu thereof to insert "the time of removal of the disability of the pensioner, as provided in section 5."

Mr. Speaker, the proviso, as it stands now in the sixth section, is:

That no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the 1st day of May, 1865.

To make this section harmonize with the amendment adopted to the fifth section, I have offered the amendment just read by the Clerk. If that amendment be adopted, widows will be entitled to arrearages between the date of the cessation of the disability provided for in the fifth section and the death of the husband. It makes the two sections harmonize.

Mr. CASWELL. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that I have an amendment which I think provides for that, and if permitted I will offer it now.

Mr. HUNTON. I will hear the gentleman's amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of section 6 after "1862," in the eighth line, and insert the following: Shall be placed upon the roll and be entitled to receive such pension from the passage of this act.

Mr. CASWELL. That simply provides that the widows of such pensioners as have deceased after their names were stricken from the roll shall be placed upon the roll in lieu of the deceased husbands, and draw the pension from this time as though the husbands had survived. It is substantially the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan, but in a somewhat different form.

Mr. HUNTON. I yield to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. REAGAN. I suggest that if the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] be adopted, the section will not then conform to the amendment made in the fifth section, and there would be a discrimination against the widow. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] makes the sixth section conform in its letter to the fifth section as amended on motion of the gentleman from Wisconsin, and limits the right of the widow to arrearages to those arrearages which may accrue after the removal of the disabilities of the pensioner and up to the time of his death, and no more. Now, if the pensioner under section 5, as amended, is entitled to his pension from the date of the removal of his disabilities, as that section as amended says he is, then I submit to the House that the widow ought to be entitled to the arrearages, not back to 1865, as provided in the original bill, but back to the time of the removal of the disabilities of her husband, and from that to the time of his death.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I think the difficulty in this case grows out of a misunderstanding on the part of gentlemen on both sides as to the meaning of the words "removal of disabilities." My friends on my left do not understand it as my friend on my right [Mr. CASWELL] does. My friends on my left desire that the widows shall have the same benefit as their husbands would have received after their disabilities were removed to the time of their death. My friend on my right [Mr. CASWELL] suggests that the widow shall receive the pension from the passage of this act. As a compromise, and to carry out the views of both, I would suggest that the widow be declared entitled to the same pension as her husband would have received if living.

Mr. REAGAN. I understand the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan was intended to have that effect and would have it. If that be so, I think his amendment would cover the point which gentlemen have in view.

Mr. HUNTON. That amendment is not before the House. I move the previous question on the amendment I have offered.

Mr. CONGER. I hope the demand for the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a question of order. I offered an amendment, which was read at the desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] had not the floor to offer the amendment. His amendment was merely read for the information of the House.

Mr. CASWELL. I understood the gentleman from Virginia to yield the floor.

Mr. HUNTON. I merely yielded to have the gentleman's amendment read.

Mr. GOODIN. I call for the reading of the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. HUNTON'S amendment was again read.

Mr. KASSON. With the permission of the gentleman from Virginia, I desire to point out a difficulty arising from the language of the first two lines of section 6. It is not there provided in regard to widows, as in the first section of the bill, that they shall have been married prior to the year 1850.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia has moved that debate be closed on the pending amendment.

Mr. KASSON. If he has only moved the previous question on the pending amendment I am willing that that shall be first disposed of.

Mr. HUNTON. I have moved the previous question on the pending amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I ask to be heard for a moment.

Mr. HUNTON. I insist on the call for the previous question.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 92, noes 54.

So the previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof Mr. HUNTON'S amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS. I desire to move to reconsider the amendment adopted at line 3 in section 5.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that we cannot go back to that section till we finish the sixth section. We are now considering section 6, and I desire to offer an amendment to it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Section 6 is the last clause of the bill. The motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to reconsider the amendment to section 5 will be in order after section 6 is disposed of.

Mr. KASSON. I gave notice that I desired to offer an amendment to the sixth section. I think, Mr. Speaker, there has been some misunderstanding on the one side and on the other in regard to the relations to the sixth section, of the amendment adopted to the fifth section. That amendment to the fifth section I was not fully able to comprehend.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That question is not before the House. Does the gentleman from Iowa desire to move an amendment to the sixth section?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, sir; and I have a right to speak in explanation of my amendment.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman from Iowa will allow me I desire to say that in my amendment to the sixth section the intention was to copy the exact language of the amendment adopted to the fifth section. Though copied from memory, I believe it was done accurately.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to state what my difficulty is so far as this sixth section is concerned. We have never allowed a Union soldier or the widow of a Union soldier in any special act of Congress a single year's back pension, and the practice of the House and the Senate has been against it in special acts. We are asked now to go back seven years by this bill and allow back pension to the widows of men who were, to use a common phrase, disloyal and enemies of their country.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is not discussing any amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I am speaking on the section, and I suppose I have a right to do that. I move, then, an amendment to the bill by inserting in the second line of the section, after the words "1812," the following:

Having married prior to the year 1850.

Now I am certainly in order. We on this side object to this sixth section of the bill because it does what I say is without precedent in our dealing with the widows of Union soldiers, and we are not willing to go so much further in this case and give seven years' back pension to the widows of men whose pensions were refused them on account of their being enemies of the country. That is a simple statement of that part of the proposition.

Now, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] has put in an amendment the effect of which I cannot fully estimate, because I do not know whether it is intended to limit the payment of arrearages to the time when these new sections would take effect. I presume not, because gentlemen on the other side of the House voted down the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] which was designed to produce that result. I presume, then, this section still leaves a considerable amount of arrearages to the widows of soldiers.

Now, if the gentleman from Virginia will say that the object of his amendment is to prevent us from going back on the old congressional rule against arrearages of pensions by special acts, I shall then understand it and take no further time of the House. If, on the contrary, it is intended to go back under the circumstances, we might as well have the issue made either now or on the last vote on the bill and let the majority pass it, as they have the power to do, if they desire it. Another reason why I think the amendment will not have that effect is because it leaves in the tenth and eleventh lines the words "shall be entitled to the arrearages of pensions due said pensioner at the time of his decease;" and even with this amendment it seems to me it would compel us to go back and pay pensions up to the time the death occurred.

If I have made myself understood, we can now understand each other.

Mr. HUNTON. By the previous action of the House line 3 of section 5 was stricken out, which gave pensions to those who were dropped from the rolls of the Pension Office "from the 1st of May, 1865," and to that section the following proviso was added:

Provided, That no money shall be paid to any one on account of arrears during his term of disability.

Mr. KASSON. Is the gentleman reading the Clerk's copy?

Mr. HUNTON. Yes; I got it from the Clerk this moment; and in order to make this section harmonize with that provision the amendment to the proviso of this section was offered by myself, so that the arrearages provided for the soldier, for the survivor, and which had accrued to him at the time of his death, shall go to his widow in the same manner that he would have received it had he lived.

Mr. KASSON. We understood the motion to be "prior to the passage of this act."

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir; as I have said before, the proviso to the fifth section to which the House agreed to is as follows: "Provided that no money shall be paid to any one on account of arrearages during his term of disability." Then the amendment to the proviso of the sixth section provides that arrearages due the soldier at the time of his death from the removal of his disability, according to the fifth section, shall on his death go to his widow, and that is necessary to harmonize this section with the amendment adopted to the fifth section.

Mr. KASSON. Now I observe the point, and that is what the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. CASWELL] required. The disability is that existing to-day, and which will exist until the passage of this act, and consequently the simpler way for the gentleman to get at it would be to suggest an amendment something like that of the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] to strike out the last half of the section, and say they shall be entitled to pensions from the day of the passage of this act; then the bill will harmonize, unless he puts a different construction on the subject than I do.

Mr. HUNTON. It will not harmonize, because for the period during which the soldier had been entitled to a pension the widow would not be entitled to it.

Mr. KASSON. The soldier is not entitled to a pension except after the date of the passage of this act; he is under disability until the act passed, so that his widow would not be entitled to it under the language of this section. But the words "arrearages" in the tenth and twelfth lines are certainly inconsistent with this amendment.

I now ask a vote upon my amendment. The object of it is to make this section harmonize with the first section.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no objection to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. Now I would be glad to have the last section read as amended.

The Clerk read the last section, as amended, as follows:

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, who was married prior to 1850, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act entitled "An act authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to strike from the pension-rolls the names of such persons as have taken up arms against the Government or who have in any manner encouraged the rebels," approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to the arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease; and the marriage of such widow shall not prevent her from receiving such arrearages of pension. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner, provided that no such arrearages shall be paid for any period prior to the time of the removal of the disability of the pensioner in section 5.

Mr. KASSON. Now if the gentleman will change it and say "prior to the passage of this act," although it will be inconsistent with previous parts of the bill, it will satisfy the ends of justice.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire but a moment—for I do not think it should pass in silence—to notice the expression of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] which I think must have come from a confusion of facts and the failure to realize the objects of this bill.

It is stated as a reason why the widows of these pensioners should not receive the pensions due their husbands after the removal of their disabilities, that it is an exception to the rule heretofore acted upon by Congress; that we have never before given the right to the widow even of a Union soldier to draw any back pension.

Mr. KASSON. Not by a special act.

Mr. REAGAN. Perhaps the statement may be so limited, if the gentleman desires it; not by a special act. But what I desire to say is that the law giving pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 was passed many years ago. I believe the first law was passed in 1844; so that if no intervening difficulty occurred they were entitled to their pensions from that time. Nobody now contemplates, this bill does not contemplate, that these widows shall go back to the period at which their husbands were entitled to pensions.

The question is, will Congress restore to these pensioners the right to draw their pensions? This bill also extends the provisions of the pension law to those who served for short periods. The benefit of that provision is not limited to those in the South; it will extend to many more persons in the other States. This is not going back to the period at which these soldiers were entitled to draw pensions, but simply revives the right of these pensioners from a particular date, not giving the right but reviving it. And the proposition is to give the widows of certain pensioners the right to draw pensions from the time of the restoration of the right to the husband to the death of the husband. If I am right, and I cannot see it in any other light, there is no reason for saying that we propose by this bill to make an exception to the practice heretofore adopted by Congress.

Mr. HUNTON. Is there any amendment pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is not.

Mr. HUNTON. Then I call the previous question on this section.

Mr. CONGER. I have tried several times to offer an amendment to this section which I think essential.

Mr. HUNTON. I cannot yield.

Mr. CONGER. Then I move that the House now adjourn; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. KASSON. I rise to a question of order. In considering this bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole, have we not a right to offer amendments, although the power may exist to close debate? We cannot cut off amendments in Committee of the Whole, though we may close debate.

Mr. HUNTON. I have no desire to cut off amendments, but I do desire to cut off debate, because I wish to have this bill acted on today.

Mr. CONGER. I think the gentleman will further business by allowing amendments.

Mr. HUNTON. That is a matter of opinion.

Mr. CONGER. We will see.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman has an amendment to offer I will not exclude it.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman did exclude it by his motion for the previous question.

Mr. HUNTON. I will yield for an amendment now.

Mr. CONGER. Then I offer the amendment and desire to say——

Mr. HUNTON. I do not yield for debate, only for an amendment.

Mr. CONGER. I claim the right to discuss my amendment. I move to amend this sixth section by striking out these words:

The arrearages of pension due said pensioner at the time of his decease; and the marriage of such widow shall not prevent her from receiving such arrearages of pension. In case there is no surviving widow, then such arrearages of pension shall, upon similar proof, go to the minor children of such pensioner.

And to insert in lieu thereof the words "make claim for a pension as such widow after the passage of this act under the existing provisions of law;" so that it will read:

SEC. 6. That the surviving widow of any pensioner of the war of 1812, where the name of said pensioner was stricken from the pension-rolls in pursuance of the act * * * approved February 4, 1862, and where said pensioner died without his name being restored to the rolls, shall be entitled to make claim for a pension as such widow, after the passage of this act, under the provisions of existing law.

There is no provision in this bill as it now stands by which the widow of a person who has died during the time he was under this disability may be in any way placed upon the pension-roll, or may make claim for a pension at all. I desire that the widows of those who are entitled to pensions and who died during disability may be permitted to come in and make their claim under existing law, as the widows of other soldiers may do. I also desire to strike out of this section the portion relating to arrearages, which was disposed of in the proviso adopted to the fifth section.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] has not anywhere in this bill provided that the widows of those pensioners who have died during their disability may ever come in and claim a pension, as widows of other deceased soldiers may do. I think that it is an oversight that he would desire to correct. The object of my amendment is to place the widows of deceased soldiers who have been disqualified because of disloyalty on the same footing as the widows of other soldiers.

Mr. HUNTON. If the gentleman will turn to the very first section of this bill he will find this provision:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place on the pension-rolls the names of the surviving officers and enlisted and drafted men, without regard to color, including militia and volunteers of the military and naval service of the United States, who served for ten days in the war with Great Britain of 1812 and were honorably discharged, and the surviving widows of such officers and enlisted and drafted men: Provided, That such widows shall have been married prior to the year 1850 to such officers or enlisted or drafted men.

Mr. CONGER. That applies to the widows of officers and men who served sixty days?

Mr. HUNTON. It does not.

Mr. CONGER. It does not include those whose husbands have already been on the pension-roll.

Mr. HUNTON. On the contrary, it puts on the pension-roll every soldier who served ten days, and the widow of every such soldier or officer who married prior to 1850.

Mr. CONGER. I know that; but the widows to whom my amendment refers are the widows of those whose names have been stricken off by virtue of the law which the gentleman is trying to correct by this bill. Under the provisions of the first section of this bill there is no power for them to reclaim the pension taken from their husbands.

The first clause provides that in addition to those who might otherwise have been on the pension-rolls, those who served ten days shall be placed there; but these are the widows of those who served sixty days or over, and there is no provision for them.

Mr. HUNTON. If a widow is entitled to go upon the pension-rolls when her husband has served ten days, is she not entitled to go upon the rolls when her husband has served sixty days? Can there be any doubt about that? Does not the gentleman know that any provision for ten days' service must embrace those who served sixty days?

Mr. CONGER. That is a question of arithmetic that can be worked out on a slate perhaps; the gentleman can do that at his leisure. But this is the point: The gentleman has tried by this bill to restore their pensions to those officers and soldiers who may be alive at the passage of this act; but he has failed to make any provision for the widows of those who died before the passage of this bill, and who were struck from the pension-rolls by former laws. It is strange that I should be compelled here to advocate the rights of widows of disloyal men; but it is just, and therefore I will advocate it even if their friends on the other side of the House keep silent, as they ought not to do.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. CONGER, it was agreed to.

Mr. DUNNELL. I move to amend by adding the following:

And provided further, That under this act any widow of a revolutionary soldier who served sixty days shall be placed upon the pension-rolls of the United States and receive a pension at the rate of $8 per month.

This puts the remaining widows of revolutionary soldiers upon the same footing with widows of soldiers of 1812.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTON. In consequence of the striking out of the first three lines of the bill, it becomes necessary to move to add as a new section the following:

SEC. 7. That all laws and clauses of laws in conflict with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. HUNTON. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Before that is done, I wish to offer an amendment.

Mr. WHITE. I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No amendment is in order pending the motion for the previous question.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I know that the amendment I wish to offer would be agreed to unanimously. It is in behalf of the widow of a revolutionary soldier.

Mr. HURLBUT. An amendment of that kind has been adopted already.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I know that; but it does not go to the extent desired. I know in the State of Virginia the widow of a soldier of the revolutionary war. Her name was stricken from the rolls under the act of 1862. I desire that she shall be restored and receive her arrearages of pay. I presume no one will say that she was engaged in the rebellion. She must now be one hundred years old.

Several MEMBERS. Put her on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] yield for any further amendment?

Mr. HUNTON. No, sir.

Mr. WHITE. I move, then, that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question then recurred on seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore was proceeding to state the question, when—

Mr. CONGER said: Mr. Speaker, I insist upon being heard when I address the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair begs leave to state to the gentleman from Michigan that it is out of order to interrupt the Chair when he is stating a question.

Mr. CONGER. If the Chair pleases, I addressed the Chair at the proper time for me to make a motion to reconsider before a new proposition was made, and the Chair refused to hear me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is out of order, unless he rises to a point of order. The question is, Shall this bill be ordered to be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which——

Mr. CONGER. If that is debatable, I wish to say——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose it is debatable.

Mr. RANDALL. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The question was put on the motion of Mr. RANDALL; and the SPEAKER pro tempore declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Several members called for a division.

Mr. CASWELL. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Michigan had the floor when the gentleman from Pennsylvania moved to lay the motion on the table.

Mr. WHITE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether it lies in the power of the gentleman who has charge of the bill to cut off amendments when it was stated by the Chair that any one could move amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. When the House has ordered the previous question, both debate and amendments are cut off.

The question being again taken on the motion of Mr. RANDALL to lay the motion to reconsider on the table, there were—ayes 105, noes 11; and the motion was declared agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now recurs on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. PRATT. I call for the announcement of the last vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has already announced it.

Mr. PRATT. I did not understand it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The ayes were 105, noes 11.

Mr. PRATT. I make the point that no quorum voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point comes too late. The Chair had decided the question and proceeded to another branch of the subject.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask for the reading of the bill in full as it has been amended.

Mr. CONGER. I ask for the reading of the engrossed bill.

Mr. COX. I move the House adjourn, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays. While the House is voting on the motion to adjourn the bill can be engrossed if it has not been engrossed already.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CONGER. I ask unanimous consent to make a proposition. I withdraw my demand for the reading of the engrossed bill. I do not wish unnecessarily to detain the House.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to have the bill read as amended if that be in order.

Mr. ATKINS. Let us go on with the call of the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn if gentlemen insist upon making propositions out of order.

The bill was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HUNTON. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. HUNTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HALLET KILBOURN.

Mr. GLOVER. I rise to a privileged question. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of adopting the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

Mr. FORT. Is not a motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is if the gentleman has the floor, but the Chair has recognized the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. GLOVER. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it appears from the accounts of the keeper of the House restaurant with Hallet Kilbourn that said Kilbourn, now confined as a prisoner in the District jail by order of this House, is being fed in the most extravagant and sumptuous manner and his meals are being sent to him twice daily from the Capitol to the jail in a hack, and he is also being furnished by his friends with wines of the most expensive kind; and whereas such things are destructive of all jail discipline and of the object for which said Kilbourn has been imprisoned: Therefore,

Resolved by this House, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and required to contract with the jailor of this District to furnish said Kilbourn the same prison fare as is furnished to other prisoners in said jail, and the said Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby instructed not to furnish to the said Kilbourn any fare other than that above specified, nor to allow him any wines, liquors, or other intoxicating drink, except when the same may be prescribed to him as medicine by a regular physician of good standing.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to lay that resolution upon the table.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend by striking out——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order to amend the resolution. The motion is to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution.

Mr. GLOVER. I have not surrendered the floor, and I hope the House will indulge me for a moment. I send up this bill of fare to be read from the desk, to show how Mr. Kilbourn is being fed from the House restaurant.

Mr. FORT. Your own Sergeant-at-Arms furnished it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The reading of the paper cannot be proceeded with if objection be made.

Mr. FORT. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. BANNING. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before taking the question on the motion to adjourn the Chair will make announcements of leave of absence.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object to the announcement of leave of absence?

Mr. RANDALL. I do at this time.

Mr. GLOVER. Is it in order to take a gentleman off the floor by a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist on my motion to adjourn.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 108.

Mr. BANNING. I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. Let us have the yeas and nays on the resolution.

Mr. COX. I would like to know whether the bill of fare is part of this resolution?

Mr. FORT. I object to debate.

Mr. COX. I am not debating, I am asking a proper question.

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. COX. I ask whether the bill of fare is part of the resolution?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not.

Mr. GLOVER. What has become of the bill of fare?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is on the Clerk's desk, but its reading has been objected to.

The House divided on the motion to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution; and there were—ayes 106, noes 69.

Mr. RUSK. That is not two-thirds.

Mr. BANNING demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, of Illinois, the resolution was again read.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is the resolution divisible?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not. The motion is to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution, and that motion is not divisible.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 96, nays 59, not voting 134; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Atkins, Bagby, John H. Bagley, jr., Banning, Blackburn, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Caldwell, Candler, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Williams, James Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—134.

So (two-thirds not having voted in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. MAISH said: I am paired on all political questions with my colleague, Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. As gentlemen on the other side seem to make this a political question, I doubt my right to vote. I therefore do not vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

EVENING SESSIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the rules be suspended so as to enable the House to take a daily recess for three days of the present week, to wit, Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, at half past four o'clock p. m. until half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of considering the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. RUSK. O, no; you want to kill us.

Mr. RANDALL. Three evening sessions now are equal to two days at the end of the session, and are absolutely necessary.

The question being taken on suspending the rules, there were ayes 98, noes none.

Mr. FORT and Mr. RUSK. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, if you do that, I will call the yeas and nays.

Mr. FORT. Very well. We have been run over all day, and we may as well stay a little longer.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest that the objection that no quorum has voted be withdrawn, to save the time of calling the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No debate is in order. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 105, nays 9, not voting 175; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. John H. Bagley, jr., Ballou, Bell, Blackburn, Blount, Bradford, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. Burchard, Burleigh, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. Williams, James Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young—175.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the question of suspending the rules and agreeing to the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the ayes are 105 and the noes 9.

Mr. RUSK. No quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. Do you make that point?

Mr. RUSK. I do.

Mr. WHITE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL. Is the point made by the gentleman from Wisconsin that there is no quorum?

Mr. RUSK. I make the point that there is no quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I move that there be a call of the House. I do it in justice to those of us who remain here to transact the public business.

Mr. FORT, (at six o'clock and two minutes p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken, and the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. HOAR. I rise to a question of order, and the question of order is that there can be no call of the House under the rules of the House unless there be a Speaker in the chair.

Mr. RANDALL. There is a Speaker in the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Speaker [Speaker KERR] may appoint any member of the House for the day, and the present occupant of the chair will be the Speaker until the House adjourns.

Mr. HOAR. This is a very important point, and I desire to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is not well taken.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Chair allow me to state the point?

Several MEMBERS called for the regular order.

Mr. HEREFORD. The gentleman must know that the same thing has happened time after time and night after night.

[Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was taken on Mr. RANDALL'S motion; and it was agreed to.

So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Adams, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, William H. Baker, Banks, Barnum, Bass, Beebe, Blaine, Bland, Bliss, Boone, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, William R. Brown, William P. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Cason, Caswell, Cate, Chapin, Chittenden, Clymer, Cochrane, Collins, Cowan, Cox, Crapo, Crounse, Danford, Darrall, Davy, Douglas, Egbert, Ely, Evans, Farwell, Faulkner, Freeman, Frost, Frye, Garfield, Gause, Gibson, Goode, Goodin, Hale, Robert Hamilton, Haralson, Hardenbergh, Henry R. Harris, John T. Harris, Harrison, Hartridge, Hathorn, Haymond, Hays, Hendee, Henderson, Henkle, Abram S. Hewitt, Goldsmith W. Hewitt, Hoge, Holman, Hopkins, Hoskins, House, Hubbell, Hunter, Hurlbut, Hyman, Joyce, Kelley, Ketchum, Kimball, King, Lamar, Franklin Landers, George M. Landers, Lane, Lawrence, Leavenworth, Lewis, Luttrell, Lynch, Edmund W. M. Mackey, Magoon, Maish, McCrary, McDill, McFarland, Meade, Metcalfe, Miller, Milliken, Money, Monroe, Morey, Morgan, Neal, New, Norton, O'Brien, Odell, Packer, Page, Parsons, Payne, Phelps, John F. Philips, William A. Phillips, Pierce, Piper, Plaisted, Platt, Powell, Purman, Rainey, James B. Reilly, Roberts, Miles Ross, Schumaker, Seelye, Sheakley, Sinnickson, A. Herr Smith, William E. Smith, Southard, Sparks, Strait, Stenger, Stevenson, Swann, Teese, Thomas, Thornburgh, Martin I. Townsend, Washington Townsend, Tufts, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Gilbert C. Walker, Walls, Walsh, Ward, G. Wiley Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Whiting, Whitthorne, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, Charles G. Williams, James Williams, Willis, Wilshire, Benjamin Wilson, Fernando Wood, Woodburn, Woodworth, and Young.

The roll having been twice called over,

The SPEAKER pro tempore said: The Doorkeeper will cause the doors of the House to be closed, and will not admit any member within the Hall.

Mr. RANDALL. In order to save time, and before the names of members are called for excuses, which can come in afterward, I move the order that the Sergeant-at-Arms bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are now absent without the leave of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks it is too soon to make that order. If it is made now before excuses are heard, members who may be excused hereafter may be brought in here under arrest.

Mr. STONE. I move that Mr. HOLMAN, of Indiana, be excused on account of sickness.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. I also move that my colleague, Mr. BLAND, be excused on account of sickness.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. By your order, Mr. Speaker, the doors are shut, and gentlemen are beginning to make excuses. We can have at least three roll-calls on each excuse if we see fit, and the result is that we shut ourselves in here indefinitely. This occurred in the last Congress, and under the ruling you have now made we found that, after being here two or three hours, the House could not work at all. We have a constitutional right to bring the absentees here, and the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that you issue your warrant to the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the absentees, is the only way by which the House can work.

Mr. RANDALL. That is right.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If that is done we can then hear excuses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will read the rule.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know the rule, every word of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the Chair will not read it.

Mr. KEHR. I desire to say that my colleague, Mr. PHILIPS, is sick, and on that account I hope he will be excused.

Mr. SAYLER. I object to any excuses just now.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit the order that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody and bring to the bar of the House those of its members who are absent without leave of the House.

Mr. HOAR. I submit that that motion is only in order when the Speaker is in the Chair, and that a member designated for a day to perform the duties of the Chair is merely designated as a presiding officer of the House, and is not the Speaker of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. That is at variance with common sense, and that is the only remark I have to make about it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This point of order has been frequently made and decided as it has been decided to-day, that the occupant of the chair is Speaker during the session for which he is appointed.

Mr. HOAR. Does the Chair overrule the point of order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does overrule it.

Mr. HOAR. Then I respectfully claim an appeal.

Mr. BANNING. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I think I am entitled to the floor to state my point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio certainly has a right to make a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOAR. I have not been able to state my point of order to the House. It is a constitutional question.

Mr. RANDALL. I think it is a question of common sense.

Mr. HOAR. I am sure the gentleman from Pennsylvania does not intend to be discourteous to me.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question to the House. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] has raised the point of order that there is no Speaker in the House to execute the orders of the House. The Chair has decided that the point of order is not well taken; that the present occupant of the chair will discharge the duties of Speaker for this day's session. The gentleman from Massachusetts appeals from that decision of the Chair, and the question is: Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House? Pending that question, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] moves that the appeal from the decision of the Chair be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOAR. Has the gentleman from Ohio the floor to make that motion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was recognized by the Chair.

Mr. HOAR. It is a departure from all the courtesies of this House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman appealed from the decision of the Chair, but did not proceed to make any remarks.

Mr. HOAR. I raised an appeal from the decision of the Chair; and before the question was stated by the Chair to the House, the gentleman from Ohio made a motion to lay the appeal upon the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to lay upon the table is in order.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman had no right to make that motion until my appeal was stated to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to lay on the table is not debatable.

Mr. HOAR. The Chair violates all the courtesies of the House in so ruling.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair regrets that the gentleman so regards it.

The motion of Mr. BANNING was agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay my appeal on the table. I have no desire to filibuster, but——

Mr. KNOTT. I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call would be in order.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. Can we not agree to have the night sessions and stop this nonsense? That is what I want to know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot decide that question.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. I would like to have it submitted to the House.

Mr. KNOTT. Is my motion to adjourn in order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain the motion to adjourn.

Mr. CAULFIELD. How can we get out? The doors are closed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the motion to adjourn is carried, the doors will be opened.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is the first in order.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move now that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL. I make a further appeal to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. RUSK] who insisted upon the point of order that no quorum voted upon my resolution for night sessions.

Mr. RUSK. I will not insist upon my point of order.

Mr. RANDALL. As the gentleman from Wisconsin withdraws his point of order against the adoption of my resolution, I hope there will be no further objection to it, but that the resolution may be adopted without further trouble.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That order can be made by unanimous consent.

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. Why?

Mr. FORT. Gentlemen have begun to run this thing, and now let them go on with it.

Mr. RANDALL. Then you are to blame, and not I, if this thing continues.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] the question now before the House is upon the motion of the gentleman that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to take into custody and bring to the bar of the House such of its members as are absent without the leave of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EAMES. I move that all further proceedings under this call be dispensed with.

Mr. COOK. We voted that motion down just now.

Mr. EAMES. Other business has intervened.

The motion of Mr. EAMES was not agreed to.

Mr. SAYLER. I desire to make a proposition for the unanimous consent of the House. I do not believe that the members of this House are at all inclined—I will not say to play the great big boy, because that is hard on the boy—to play the great big baby. I propose, therefore, that by unanimous consent we agree to meet on the evenings of Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday, for discussion and consideration of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, and that we abandon all further proceedings under the call of the House.

Mr. HOOKER. Make it Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday.

Mr. SAYLER. I am asking unanimous consent to agree to the proposition as submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. It was claimed that there was no quorum, and of course the resolution could not be adopted.

Mr. SAYLER. It can be by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objection to dispensing with further proceedings under the call, if my resolution can be adopted.

Mr. SAYLER. My proposition is that the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be now adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. STONE, Mr. THROCKMORTON, and others objected.

After some time,

Mr. CONGER said: I take the liberty of appealing to those gentlemen on the democratic side of the House who objected to the agreement proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SAYLER] to withdraw their objection.

Mr. ROBBINS, of North Carolina. That is right.

Mr. RANDALL. I want to understand what the proposition is. Is it that the resolution for night sessions, as I originally offered it, be adopted?

Mr. SAYLER. That is my proposition.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there is no objection, all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with, and the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] in regard to night sessions will be agreed to.

Mr. THROCKMORTON. I object.

Mr. STONE. I object, and I desire to state the grounds——

Several MEMBERS objected to debate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No debate is in order.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I now move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, if gentlemen on the other side of the House will agree to withdraw their objection that there was no quorum upon the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RUSK. I have stated that I will withdraw my objection.

Mr. TERRY. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The arrangement suggested can only be made by unanimous consent; and there is objection.

Mr. CONGER. I object to its going upon record on the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] that the objection comes from this side of the House. It has been withdrawn on this side long ago; the objections are upon the other side; they come from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. THROCKMORTON] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr TERRY.]

Mr. RANDALL. I do not any longer charge it upon the other side.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman from Illinois did.

Mr. SAYLER. I will attest the same thing.

Mr. O'NEILL. I would like to make a suggestion to my colleague, [Mr. RANDALL,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am exceedingly anxious that the business of the House should go on and that we should have night sessions, because, if we do not, no one can say when we shall be able to adjourn finally. Now, I suggest to my colleague that for this week only we meet on Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday at eleven o'clock in the morning and sit until five o'clock in the afternoon, and then adjourn. I propose this as a compromise, for the present week. With daily sessions of six hours we may do as much as by holding two daily sessions.

Mr. RANDALL. That would interfere with all our committee business, and I cannot consent to it.

A MEMBER. Let the committees meet in the evening.

Mr. FORT. This side of the House has been striving to-day to get some recognition. We have a couple of resolutions, and if we had been allowed to present them I am confident there would have been none of this delay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Resolutions are not now in order.

Mr. FORT. There seems to be nothing else on hand.

Mr. MILLS. I move that the House take a recess until nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. FORT. I want to know whether it is in order to send for some of Mr. Kilbourn's lunch? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WHITE. I move that all the doors of the galleries be opened, so that we may get some fresh air here. The air is very foul.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is not in order.

Mr. WHITE. Is it not in order to open the doors of the galleries, so as to get some fresh air?

Mr. HOOKER. I move to dispense with all further proceedings under the call, provided the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be unanimously adopted.

Mr. NASH. I object.

Mr. WHITE. I object unless I am allowed to introduce my resolution.

Several MEMBERS. O, no.

Mr. HOAR. Cannot the question be settled by a majority vote?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Further proceedings under the call can be dispensed with by a majority vote; but the motion, as now submitted, is coupled with the suggestion that unanimous consent be given to adopt the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] and objection was heard to the latter proposition.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, if this motion to dispense with further proceedings under the call be adopted by a majority, his motion can then be adopted by a majority. Nobody will make the point in regard to the absence of a quorum.

Mr. RANDALL. I renew the proposition that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with, provided that the vote on the adoption of my resolution, which was 98 to 9, shall not be objected to upon the ground of the absence of a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, that arrangement will be made.

Mr. NASH. I object.

Mr. RUSK. I make the point that I raised the objection originally and I have withdrawn it.

Mr. WIKE. But I submit that any other gentleman may renew the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Any member has the right to object.

Mr. WHITE. I object, unless I be allowed to introduce my resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. I suggest that the gentleman have leave to print his resolution in the morning paper.

Mr. CAULFIELD. May I inquire of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. WHITE] what his resolution is?

Mr. WHITE. May I be allowed to tell the gentleman, in the language of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] that it is "none of his business?" [Laughter.]

Mr. FORT. I suggest that we might consider those resolutions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No business is in order.

Mr. RUSK. Is it in order to have the Kilbourn bill of fare read?

Mr. PLATT. Is it in order to have the bill of fare served?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is if gentlemen will pay for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. O'NEILL. It seems, Mr. Speaker, that ninety-eight gentlemen voted to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution so we can have evening sessions for the consideration of the general appropriation bills, and only nine members voted against it. After that vote I do not see how gentlemen can stand up here to prevent the House going on with the legitimate public business we are sent here to transact. [Cries of "Good! Good!"] I do hope those on this side who have made objection will withdraw it. I do not believe the country will stand by any nine men who in this way seek to stop the legitimate business of the country.

Mr. WHITE. I do not intend to obstruct business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognized the gentleman from New York.

Mr. LAPHAM. I wish to suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, that he adopt the suggestion of his colleague to have the daily sessions commence at eleven o'clock. It is much easier for committees to meet in the evening than for the House. If we commence our sessions at eleven o'clock in the morning, I am sure we will accomplish more in that way than by having evening sessions.

Mr. RANDALL. That is contrary to the experience of the older members. Certainly it is contrary to my experience.

Mr. PATTERSON. The Doorkeeper of the House refuses to allow the Delegate from Colorado to leave the Hall.

Mr. FORT. I object to the gentleman's leaving.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made to the gentleman's leaving; but as the Delegate is no part of the quorum of the House, he has the right to leave.

Mr. WADDELL. Is there objection to the adoption of the proposition that all further proceedings under the call will be dispensed with and the resolution submitted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania will be adopted?

Mr. CONGER. I have voted for evening sessions; I desire to continue my vote for them; but I make a suggestion to the Chair and to the House——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. CONGER. I wish to suggest whether we can, with the doors closed and members interested in our agreement in regard to evening sessions not allowed to come into the Hall—I ask whether we can properly keep other members out of the House until we make the arrangement for night sessions?

Mr. RANDALL. They ought to have been here; and, not being here, they are not entitled to that consideration.

Mr. CONGER. That is very true.

Mr. RANDALL. Or to the consideration which they might have had.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Discussion is not in order. The Chair hears no objection to further proceedings under the call being dispensed with, and by unanimous consent the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania for evening sessions is agreed to. The doors will now be re-opened.

And then, on motion of Mr. RANDALL, (at five minutes to seven o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. BANKS: Memorial of A. F. Breed & Co. and 60 manufacturers of boots and shoes, that the duty now imposed on English lastings and serges by weight may be changed to an ad valorem duty, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, the memorial of A. F. Breed and 60 other shoe manufacturers of Massachusetts, for an amendment to section 3020 of the Revised Statutes, inserting in addition to said section the words "and also boots and shoes" after the words "United States," to the same committee.

Also, the petition of W. H. Gould, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Susan A. Heazlit, for a pension, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of Edwin A. Leland, for an extension of letters-patent on an improved paint-can, to the Committee on Patents.

By Mr. LORD: The petition of importers and dealers in crockery from Utica, New York, that a uniform rate of duty of 30 per cent. be levied upon earthenware, crockery, china and glass ware, &c., to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. LYNDE: The petition of E. M. Gilbert and others, for certain amendments to existing steamboat laws, to the Committee on Commerce.

By Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania: Memorial of workingmen in the employ of Valentines & Co., iron manufacturers in Centre County, Pennsylvania, that no change be made in the present tariff laws, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Also, memorial of workingmen in the employ of the Logan Iron and Steel Works, of Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, memorial of workingmen of Mifflin and Huntingdon Counties, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, the petition of workmen in the employ of the Glamagan Iron Company, of Mifflin County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. MEADE: The petition of wholesale liquor dealers and grocers of the city of New York, for the definition of the powers and duties of officers of internal revenue and to further provide for the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, to the same committee.

By Mr. ODELL: The petition of wholesale dealers in liquors in New Haven, of similar import, to the same committee.

Also, four petitions of citizens of New York, for the repeal of the check-stamp tax, to the same committee.

By Mr. PACKER: Remonstrance of 64 workingmen at Lebanon Furnaces, Lebanon, Pennsylvania, against the proposed reduction of the tariff and that the tariff laws may be left undisturbed, to the same committee.

Also, remonstrance of workingmen of Middletown, Dauphin County, Pennsylvania, of similar import, to the same committee.

By Mr. PLATT: The petition of citizens of Ithaca, New York, that Congress convey to the city of Brooklyn the strip of land and land under water lying between Washington avenue and the navy-yard in the city of Brooklyn for the purpose of establishing a public market, to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

By Mr. POWELL: The petition of Patrick Farrell and 790 other citizens of Pennsylvania, that some action be taken to secure the release of E. O'M. Condon, incarcerated in a British prison, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. SEELYE: The petition of citizens of Northampton, Massachusetts, against the present method of the manufacture and sale by the Government of postal envelopes and cards, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. SPRINGER: Memorial of John A. Treadway, for a pension, to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions.

By Mr. TARBOX: The petition of Charles W. Parker, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. THOMPSON: The petition of the mayor and aldermen and 100 business men of Haverhill, Massachusetts, that greenbacks be made receivable for duties on imports, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. THORNBURGH: The petition of Gilbert Reed, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, the petition of Cullen & Newman, of Knoxville, Tennessee, for a reduction of the duty on imported china and glass ware, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

By Mr. WIGGINTON: The petition of Rev. O. D. Dooley and 46 other citizens of Kern County, California, for the establishment of a post-route from Bakersfield, via Granite, to Glenville, in said county, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 4, 1876.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 186) to provide for compensation to the owners of certain lands ceded by the United States to Great Britain in and by the treaty of Washington of July 9, 1842, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The bill (H. R. No. 744) to increase the pension of Mary W. Jones, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with section 232 of the Revised Statutes, an abstract of the militia force of the United States, organized and unorganized, according to the latest returns received at the office of the Adjutant-General, United States Army; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

He also laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in relation to the condition and necessities of the Pawnee Indians in the Indian Territory, and the imperative necessity which exists for their immediate relief.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The communication will lie on the table and be printed, if there be no objection.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. It is hardly worth while to print that. The subject-matter of the communication was passed upon yesterday by the House of Representatives in a bill which will probably reach the Senate to-day and be referred to the Committee on Appropriations. I move that the letter be referred to the Committee on Appropriations without being printed.

The motion was agreed to.

UNVEILING OF LINCOLN STATUE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will present a memorial in the form of an invitation to the Senate, which will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., April 3, 1876.

SIR: On behalf of the national committee of arrangements and in the name of the colored people of the United States, I have the honor to express most grateful thanks for the passage by the Senate of the joint resolution declaring the 14th day of April, 1876, a holiday, and to extend to you, and through you to the honorable Senate, a most cordial invitation to be present at the inauguration ceremonies of the Lincoln statue which will be unveiled in Lincoln Park, in this city, at one o'clock p. m. on that day.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. LANGSTON,
Chairman of the Committee.

Hon. THOMAS W. FERRY,
President pro tempore United States Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The paper will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. It seems to me it would be courteous to take some action upon it, and therefore I move that the invitation be accepted and that the communication be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have it read again if there is to be a vote upon it.

The Chief Clerk again read the communication.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that it would be better to refer the paper to the committee without accepting the invitation at present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think not. I think the acceptance of an invitation of that kind is an act of courtesy.

Mr. DAVIS. If there is to be an acceptance, then there will be no necessity for reference to a committee.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is necessary to refer the paper in order that proper arrangements may be made for those who choose to attend.

Mr. DAVIS. An acceptance would imply an adjournment of the Senate on that day.

Mr. SHERMAN. We have made it a legal holiday already, and I doubt very much whether we can sit on that day.

Mr. WITHERS. We have made it a holiday only for the employés of the Government.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he consent to a reference without an acceptance of the invitation.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we ought to accept it out of courtesy.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to accept the invitation and refer the communication to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of A. A. Bailey, D. A. Blizard, and several hundred other citizens of New York, praying for the prohibition of the manufacture and sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of Willard E. Reynolds and other citizens of Olean, Cattaraugus County, New York, praying for the prohibition of the sale of alcoholic liquors in the District of Columbia and the Territories; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented three petitions of citizens of New York City and State, praying for the passage of House bill No. 8, providing for the improvement of the navigation of Harlem River and Spuyten Duyvil Creek; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin, presented a petition of citizens of West Sweden, Polk County, Wisconsin, praying for the establishment of a mail-route from Trade Lake, Burnett County, to West Sweden, Polk County, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of Wisconsin, relating to a consolidated official centennial directory of the General and several State governments of the United States of America; which was referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas the year 1876 being the centennial of American Independence, in order to keep pace with the spirit of the times, and more especially with the spirit of this our centennial year, and for the purpose of placing here a landmark of our national progress, which shall cement more closely the ties of a national fraternity and good feeling at this particular point of time in the history of this Union of independent States: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That the Congress of the United States and the legislative bodies of each of the several States of this Union be, and they are hereby, invited to participate with us for the purpose of compiling a consolidated official centennial directory of the several branches of the General Government and of the several State governments of this Union, which said consolidated directory shall contain a complete list, with their autobiographies, of the members of the executive, judicial, legislative, and the different heads of the military and naval departments of the General and State governments of these United States for the year 1876.

Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That, with the concurrence of the several States, Congress be, and is hereby, requested to compile and bind said consolidated directory in such style and form as may be deemed proper and fitting for this occasion.

Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That the good faith of the State of Wisconsin is hereby pledged to pay to the General Government the cost of such a number of copies of said directory as are herein designated, upon their completion and reception, to-wit: one copy for each member therein recorded from this State of Wisconsin, which said copies shall be delivered to each such member by the State, and, together with one hundred copies for the use of the State, to be deposited with the State librarian.

Resolved by the senate, (the assembly concurring,) That the governor be, and he is hereby, requested, upon the passage of these resolutions, to transmit a copy of the same to the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the governor of each of the several States, to the president of the senate and speaker of the house of the legislative body of each of the States of this Union, and solicit their co-operation and concurrence in the same.

Approved February 29, 1876.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented a memorial of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, in favor of legislation concerning the bankrupt law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented four memorials of workingmen of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, and two memorials of workingmen of Columbia County, Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any change in the present tariff laws; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Philadelphia Board of Trade, in favor of so amending the postal laws as to permit the transmission through the mails of small packages of merchandise at former rates of postage; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. MORTON presented a memorial of workingmen of Clay County, Indiana, remonstrating against the proposed change in the tariff laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WADLEIGH presented a petition of the Third Division of Sons of Temperance of New Hampshire, officially signed, praying for prohibitory legislation for the District of Columbia and the Territories, the prohibition of the foreign importation of alcoholic liquors, that total abstinence be made a condition of the civil, military, and naval service, and for a constitutional amendment to prohibit the traffic in alcoholic beverages throughout the national domain; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THE MISSISSIPPI ELECTION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore announced the appointment of Mr. BOUTWELL, Mr. CAMERON of Wisconsin, Mr. OGLESBY, Mr. BAYARD, and Mr. MCDONALD as the committee to investigate matters connected with the recent election in the State of Mississippi under the resolution adopted on the 31st of March.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am directed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2800) to enable the Secretary of the Treasury to pay judgments provided for in an act approved February 15, 1876, entitled "An act providing for the payment of judgments rendered under section 11 of chapter 459 of the laws of the first session of the Forty-third Congress," to report it back without amendment. The bill provides for the payment of the judgments in the Alabama claims cases; and as the matter is somewhat pressing, I ask for its present consideration. The Senate will see what it is from the reading of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported subject to objection.

The Chief Clerk read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. COCKRELL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. SHERMAN. I give notice that I will call it up to-morrow. I ought to state that this bill simply changes the form of the bond, and that the objection of the Senator will only delay the payment of this award another day. The Committee on Finance examined the bill carefully and unanimously report it. It takes nothing from the Treasury. A bond for $15,000,000 is now in the hands of the Secretary of State, but as a matter of course it is not available for the purposes of paying these judgments. The bill simply authorizes the surrender of that fifteen-million-dollar bond, and the issue of the same amount of other bonds, part of which is to be applied to the payment of the judgments which have been rendered.

Mr. WITHERS. I suppose the objection arose from the fact that the Senate was ignorant of the provisions of the bill. It referred to certain statutes by the number of the sections and the date of passage only.

Mr. SHERMAN. I intended to read the statutes, and I have them before me; but I have stated the substance of the bill. Three years ago Congress directed that the $15,000,000 paid by Great Britain to the United States should be put into a bond of the United States, payable to the order of the Secretary of State; and there it is. Judgments have been rendered in favor of private individuals to the amount of five or six millions, I believe, and they are to be paid; but this fifteen-million-dollar-bond is too large a denomination to pay them, and the bill provides that it is to be surrendered and other bonds issued, enough to pay the amount of these judgments. That is all. It is a House bill.

Mr. MCDONALD. I should like to have the bill laid over for the present. I know the general character of the bill. It simply provides for the payment of certain awards of judgments that have been rendered by the Alabama claims commission. I think it is very likely that I shall desire to offer a resolution looking to an inquiry in regard to some of those awards.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to letting the bill lie over, say for an hour or so.

Mr. MCDONALD. Let it lie over until after to-day, because I shall not be able to prepare my amendments to-day. I prefer that the Senator should call it up to-morrow morning.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has a right to have the bill go over until to-morrow, as it was only reported to-day; but as these creditors are pressing for money and are entitled to it, the Senator can see that every day's delay is important to them.

Mr. MCDONALD. The question I may desire to consider is whether these awards have not been greatly in excess of what they ought to have been, in some instances, and I am not yet prepared to submit the matter to the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let it lie over then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill goes over.

Mr. MCMILLAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Dr. Joseph Robbins, of Quincy, Illinois, praying for additional compensation for services rendered the United States by him as examining surgeon of applicants for invalid pensions, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I am directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Jesse Warren and Joseph A. Moore, of Nashville, Tennessee, praying compensation for a brick building and a stone foundation of a building alleged to have been destroyed by the United States Army, to report adversely, and recommend that the claim of the petitioner be disallowed.

Mr. COOPER. I ask that the report lie on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will lie on the table.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask that it be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. All written reports are ordered to be printed without a special motion.

Mr. OGLESBY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1545) declaring lands heretofore granted to certain railroad companies subject to State taxation, reported it with amendments.

Mr. WEST, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 92) to survey the Austin-Topolovampo Pacific route, reported it with amendments.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 598) to authorize Spencer F. Baird, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to receive from the King of Sweden a diploma and decoration, constituting him a member of the royal Norwegian order of Saint Olaf, the same being a literary and scientific order, reported it without amendment.

Mr. CAPERTON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of Walker Pierce, praying additional compensation for services performed as registrar in North Carolina, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 526) to amend section 1036 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, have directed me to report it without amendment. The bill in effect requires constables filing their official bond to give sureties who have real estate to the value of $5,000.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. MERRIMON. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 525) to amend section 994 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the District of Columbia, have directed me to report it without amendment. The bill in effect requires justices of the peace to give bond and security as in the case of constables.

Mr. DORSEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 680) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue, reported it with amendments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2134) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. STEVENSON, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Elizabeth M. Dittoe, daughter and heir of John Manley, an officer of the revolutionary army, praying for grant of one hundred acres of land as compensation for the services rendered by her father, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. STEVENSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 693) concerning corporations engaged in the business of distilling; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Finance, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEY (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 694) to improve the civil service of the Patent Office; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARVEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 695) to promote immigration to the United States and to protect immigrants on their passage; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. BOGY, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers in the case of A. S. Robinson be withdrawn from the files of the Senate.

THE CALENDAR.

Mr. WRIGHT. As there is no regular order to-day, I move that we proceed to the Calendar and consider unobjected cases.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am informed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MCDONALD] that he has no further desire to postpone action on the bill which I reported from the Committee on Finance this morning. I therefore move to take it up.

Mr. MCDONALD. As to that bill I make no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield for that purpose?

Mr. WRIGHT. There will be no objection to taking up the bill of the Senator from Ohio after the Calendar is ordered to be taken up.

Mr. SHERMAN. With that understanding, I have no objection to taking up the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to proceed with the Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

ALABAMA CLAIMS COURT JUDGMENTS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I now ask that House bill No. 2800 be taken up.

Mr. CONKLING. I would like to hear it reported.

Mr. COCKRELL. I thought I had my objection filed against the consideration of that bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood that the objection was withdrawn.

Mr. COCKRELL. Until I have an opportunity of examining the bill to see whether I am satisfied with it, I must object to its consideration.

Mr. SHERMAN. I supposed the objection came from the Senator from Indiana, and he withdrew it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the bill of the Senator from Ohio, the first case on the Calendar will be reported.

MUTUAL FIRE-INSURANCE COMPANY.

The first bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 700) to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire-Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. ANTHONY. Have not the persons who desire this act of incorporation a right to be incorporated under the general law of the District?

Mr. INGALLS. They have not. This is what is commonly known as a mutual insurance company, and the general law provides only for the organization and incorporation of stock companies.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am content then.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. This seems to be a long bill, and I desire to interrupt the reading of it. The Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. ENGLISH,] who is interested in the bill, is absent from the Senate, and I trust it will go over.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. INGALLS] was called out of the Chamber a moment, and asked me to interpose if any objection was made until he came back. I ask the Senator from North Carolina to withhold his objection until the Senator from Kansas returns. He will be back in a moment.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well; I will withdraw my objection for the present.

The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. I see the Senator from Kansas is in his seat now, and I will suggest to him that I understood the Senator from Connecticut felt considerable interest in this bill, and as he is absent I think it had better go over.

Mr. INGALLS. I will state to the Senator from North Carolina that is a mistake in regard to the bill which the Senator from Connecticut desires to be present at the consideration of. The bill the Senator from Connecticut desires to be heard upon is in regard to the establishment of an insurance department or a superintendent of insurance for the District of Columbia; not in regard to this bill.

Mr. MERRIMON. Very well, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the Senator from Kansas whether or not there is any general law by which fire-insurance companies and other insurance companies can be organized in this District; and, if so, what is the use of a special bill?

Mr. INGALLS. I have already stated, in response to the Senator from Rhode Island who asked the same question, that this is a mutual fire-insurance company, and the general law provides merely for the incorporation of stock companies, so that the provisions are entirely inapplicable.

Mr. DAVIS. I doubt very much the propriety of passing special bills, and I think the Senator had better let this bill go over.

Mr. INGALLS. This is a House bill and it has been considered by the committee. The incorporators and beneficiaries are among the most respectable and responsible business men of the city of Washington. They are ready to commence their operations. Insurance to the amount of $525,000 has already been subscribed for, and as there is no objection upon principle, and as the general law does not provide for the incorporation, I trust the Senator from West Virginia will permit us to pass the bill. It has been examined by several Senators, and its provisions, I believe, are found to be entirely innocent and the objects are approved.

Mr. DAVIS. The provisions of the bill may be innocent for aught I know; but I ask the Senator whether there is personal liability?

Mr. INGALLS. All the provisions of the law in regard to personal liability are preserved.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the difference, then, between the present charter and one that would be obtained under the general law?

Mr. INGALLS. As I have already explained to the Senate, this is a bill to organize a mutual fire-insurance company, and the general incorporation law provides for the incorporation of stock insurance companies. They are entirely different in their character, as the Senator undoubtedly understands. The parties named in this bill and their associates and successors unite themselves for the purpose of insuring their own property. Each one subscribes for a certain amount of insurance, and he gives his note for 10 per cent. of the amount, and that bears interest at 6 per cent. per annum. That constitutes the fund out of which losses are to be ultimately met. It is a method that has been adopted with great success in many of the States of the Union, and as the general law does not enable these gentlemen to associate themselves, it seems proper that an act of incorporation should pass.

Mr. DAVIS. If I understand correctly there is no capital except——

Mr. INGALLS. The capital consists of the premium notes given by the insured.

Mr. DAVIS. Of premium notes? But premium notes of course are no capital.

Mr. INGALLS. They constitute a lien on the real and personal property of the person who gives them.

Mr. DAVIS. How is that?

Mr. INGALLS. The notes constitutes a lien on the real and personal property of the persons who give them.

Mr. DAVIS. Does the Senator mean that the property insured has a lien upon it if damage should occur by fire?

Mr. INGALLS. All the other real and personal property owned by the persons who give the notes.

Mr. DAVIS. So far as the notes are concerned.

Mr. INGALLS. So far as the notes are concerned.

Mr. DAVIS. On the particular property that is insured. Then I understand that what is known as mutual-insurance companies have no capital whatever further than the notes and premium that may be collected from one another, and so the personal liability clause that is in the other bill, I take it, is dropped from this.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir. They are liable to the extent of the notes they give and to the amount of their insurance.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe the bill is subject to objection. I prefer that it should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator objects to the consideration of the bill. It will lie over.

Mr. DAVIS. I will state so that the Senate may understand me that to-morrow or any other day, unless I find there are real objections, I shall withdraw any objection I have after I examine the bill and see the state of facts.

GEORGETOWN AND TENNALLYTOWN RAILROAD.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1488) to incorporate the Georgetown and Tennallytown Railroad Company; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

SIOUX INDIAN RESERVATION.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes.

Mr. INGALLS. The chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON,] is absent, and I presume that bill had better lie over until his return.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over and the next bill on the Calendar will be read.

Mr. OGLESBY. I suppose in regard to Senate bill No. 590 that the Senator from Iowa would be perfectly willing that the bill should be considered and passed now if there is a disposition on the part of the Senate to pass it without any further debate. I do not know how that is, but it has been already considered in the Senate. There are only a few moments left of the morning hour, and, of course, if the bill is of that character that it will lead to debate, there will be no utility in taking it up now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business has been concluded, and the Senate is engaged in the continuous consideration of the Calendar.

Mr. OGLESBY. I have just had a conversation with two members of the Indian Committee, who were present when this bill was up before—and I was not—who tell me that the Senator from Iowa has several times expressed a very great desire to have the bill passed; but if it is thought better by the committee to let it lie over, I shall be content.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I had some conversation with the Senator from Iowa as he was about leaving the city, in which he expressd a desire to have the bill passed, but thought he would be back in season to participate in the consideration of the matter, which I understood him to be desirous of doing.

Mr. OGLESBY. I do not hear what the Senator says.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think the Senator from Iowa went away with the idea that the bill would not be considered before his return.

Mr. OGLESBY. Very well. Let it go over.

DECORATION TO PROFESSOR BAIRD.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask the consent of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] that the bill in relation to Professor Baird, which was reported by the Senator from Pennsylvania from the Committee on Foreign Relations, merely giving him a literary decoration, be taken up and passed.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 598) to authorize Spencer F. Baird, assistant secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, to receive from the King of Sweden a diploma and decoration, constituting him a member of the royal Norwegian order of Saint Olaf, the same being a literary and scientific order, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CAPITOL, NORTH O STREET AND SOUTH WASHINGTON RAILWAY.

The bill (S. No. 258) to amend the charter of the Capitol, North O Street and South Washington Railway Company was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. CONKLING. By whom was that bill reported?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. By the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of some member of the committee if that be the railroad whose tracks run across the bridge over the Eastern Branch?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not.

Mr. CONKLING. Where does this railroad operate?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is the railroad that commences in the front of the Capitol, runs up Fourth street to O street, then along O street to Eleventh street and down Eleventh to the Avenue near the National Theater. The object of this bill is simply to change the line, which under the original charter allowed two tracks on O street, to now allow them to run to P street and run one track to go one way on P street and the other on O street.

Mr. CONKLING. Which company is it whose tracks cross the eastern branch?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think it is called the Anacostia Railroad.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALMON P. GRAVES.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1580) granting a pension to Almon P. Graves; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing upon the pension-rolls, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Almon P. Graves, late a private in Company G, Third United States Artillery, of Alstead, New Hampshire.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MELVILLE H. HUDSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2305) granting a pension to Melville H. Hudson; which was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Melville H. Hudson, late drummer Company C, Third Regiment Kansas Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HARVEY LULL.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 608) to enable Harvey Lull, of Hoboken, New Jersey, to make application to the Commissioner of Patents for extension of letters-patent for a self-locking shutter-hinge; which was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask for the reading of the report in that case.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. WINDOM, from the Committee on Patents, on the 20th ultimo:

The Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the petition of Harvey Lull for an extension of his letters-patent for a self-locking shutter-hinge, having examined the evidence submitted, beg leave to report:

That said patent was issued in January, 1854, and extended by the Commissioner of Patents for a period of seven years from January, 1868; that, owing to the poverty of the inventor, he was unable for a long time to introduce his invention, and from various other causes beyond his control he failed to receive an adequate compensation therefor; that the invention is shown by the evidence to be of very considerable value to the public, but, through the misfortune rather than the fault of said Lull, the net profits received by him, after deducting necessary expenditures, have been very small.

No opposition to the extension has appeared, but, on the other hand, some eighty prominent hardware-dealers and manufacturers (not interested in the patent) residing in the cities of New York, Hoboken, Philadelphia, Reading, Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Baltimore, Washington, &c., have petitioned Congress for its extension, on the grounds that the invention is of great value to the public; that the said Lull has not received adequate compensation; that the public will be better protected by the extension, in having good and substantial castings made; and that the cost to the public will not be increased.

Believing that no one will be injured by the extension and that it will be an act of justice to the petitioner, your committee report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know what this invention is about; the report does not disclose what is the nature of the invention.

Mr. WINDOM. A self-locking shutter-hinge.

Mr. CONKLING. The bill discloses it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like to ask the Senator who reported this bill one question, whether the extension of this patent inures to the inventor or to other persons? A large proportion of extended patents inure to the benefit of others than the inventor. I should like to know if that question is understood by the committee.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee are entirely satisfied that it inures to the benefit of the inventor and his family only.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM J. ANDERSON.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 393) for the relief of William J. Anderson, of Pickensville, Alabama, which had been indefinitely postponed, and the motion to postpone indefinitely reconsidered.

Mr. COCKRELL. The bill was introduced by the Senator from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] I am ready to take it up at any time.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask that it go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN FLORIDA.

The next bill on the Calendar was the bill (S. No. 119) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to sell at public auction lands no longer required for military purposes.

The Committee on Public Lands reported an amendment, which was read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be passed over.

MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] has withdrawn his objection to the present consideration of House bill No. 700 that was suspended on his motion. I ask that the reading be resumed.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 700) to incorporate the Mutual Protection Fire-Insurance Company of the District of Columbia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WRIGHT. Some conversation occurred between the Senator from West Virginia and the Senator from Kansas, who has this bill in charge, all of which I did not hear, and it may be that the inquiries that I propose to make were answered by him. If so, he will pardon me, as I did not hear his answers to all that was inquired of him.

I find that about one-fourth or one-third of our time is taken up here in special legislation, legislation upon special matters, matters especially applicable to this District. Not very long since we had a bill for the incorporation of a company for building purposes. By reference to the statute it was found that we had a general incorporation law in this District, but it was said by the Senator reporting the bill that that law did not cover such cases. The propriety of amending the general law so as to cover such cases and avoid the necessity of these special acts was then suggested. Now we have another special act.

It is said that the present law does not cover this case because it is a mutual company and the present law does not apply to such companies. Now is it not possible, and would it not be better, by an amendment to the present general incorporation law, to cover mutual companies, and not have a special act as in this instance for the purpose of incorporating a company? If you do this, then to-morrow or before we adjourn, or as often as parties may organize a proposed new corporation, we shall have new acts presented. In almost all the States we have general laws under which incorporations can be effected. I can see no reason why it should not be done in the District of Columbia. I can see no reason why our statute-book should be encumbered by these lengthy private or special acts. I do not know but the Senator from Kansas answered the inquiry, but I make the inquiry whether it is not possible and whether it is not advisable and much better to amend the general law and let these persons come in and incorporate under it, and all other persons who may want to do so on complying with the general law? I know it is so in our State. I am sure it has been done in almost all the States. Why there should be a special act for incorporating these persons and conferring upon them special powers and privileges, I am sure I have seen no good reason yet given. It may be that it is not practicable to do it under the general law. If so, I should like to understand why it is not practicable. If it is practicable, it seems to me infinitely better that we thus legislate, and so save the time of the Senate, and save encumbering our laws with these numberless special acts.

Mr. INGALLS. I entirely agree with the Senator from Iowa in regard to the advisability of providing, as far as possible, by general laws for the incorporation of companies for the transaction of business in this District; but it is not the fault of the gentlemen named in this bill, nor is it my fault, that the general incorporation law does not provide for the creation of mutual-insurance companies. This is one of those cases; and the time that has been consumed in considering that abstract question might perhaps as well have been devoted to taking the vote upon this bill, and at least one obstacle would then have been removed from legislation.

I can say that I will at any time very heartily and very cheerfully act with the Senator from Iowa in securing such an act; but this cannot be accomplished by an amendment to the general law; it will require an entirely new chapter. I trust the Senator will not insist upon his objection sufficiently to retard or defeat the passage of this bill.
